Balancing Soul and Life

Note from Br. Gerry Molyneaux, F.S.C., '58, Chairman and founding member of La Salle's Communication Department: I think this letter by a former Communication student, Timothy O'Connor, '82, is truly an exceptionally honest piece that gets at the mission of La Salle University. The honesty of the content is rare, even courageous, and with a real depth of feeling. The ending is doubly happy. Tim gives up everything to get back to himself and his family; then his job is restored with all the title, power, and money Tim now knows he can live without. Amazing. Inspiring. Lasallian.

One of the benefits of time is being able to consider life's activities in a broader canvas. As I reach the summer of my years, I recognize how much the Communication Department and entire La Salle faculty contributed to my growth as a spiritual being.

College is more than learning skills in the classroom. The outside classroom is as important as the inside one. And in the outside classroom, the Brothers and faculty teach a most important lesson in life: unconditional love. Yes, I learned communication skills at La Salle. However, the difference with La Salle's program is the love the faculty extends to its students as fellow journeyers in this melodrama of life. And just as relationships never end, they just change, so too does the La Salle teacher-student relationship never end, it grows. The Brothers' influence continues to inspire me today, and has helped me change my life in an amazing way.

As Vice President of Marketing and Communication at Siemens (an $80 billion multinational giant), I had, according to my upbringing, achieved "success." I had power, pay, position, etc. I was traveling around the world, and living the life that many soon-to-graduate Lasallians dream about. However, last year, I realized how unconscious I was on my journey. I had lost my connection with my soul as I climbed the corporate ladder. As I turned on the ladder, I noticed that my wife and kids were not there with me. I was traveling out of town every week (much of it overseas), and it finally became too much to bear. I consciously decided to reprioritize my career in order to spend more time with my family and myself. To do so required me to give up the job I climbed the ladder to achieve. After much soul searching, in July 2002, I approached my boss in Munich and told him we needed to make a change.

Siemens gave me several months to find a new position. This time was scary and difficult, as I had to go into a personal "job detox." Like Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities, "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times." I was like a junky addicted to dope; however, my drug was my job. I finally realized how much I attached my own sense of self-worth to my job, title, pay, position, power, etc. I did get through and came out a changed man.

I have learned so much about spirituality and love. I understand more about letting go and the difference between addiction and preference: it is okay to prefer to have money, notoriety, recognition and such, however it is a challenge if you are addicted to it. And I think I understand a lot more about what you and the other Brothers were trying to model for each of us when we were in your presence, Gerry, do you realize that while I have not been in the classroom at La Salle for 20 years, and have only spent a little time with you since, that you are still a teacher to me? I'm still learning, and every day I get more connected with my true self (writing and telling others my story). My relationship with my family has also improved a great deal.

One footnote: In the debits and credits of life, the net of my change is I won the "lottery." I lost some money, maybe some power, a title, etc. However, I gained a great deal more—a soul, a family, a life. I also understand better a famous passage from the Bible. A wealthy man approaches Jesus and asks how to get to Heaven. Jesus tells him to give away everything he owns and then follow him. I had always been uncomfortable with that passage, having felt it meant that one couldn't really have wealth or its sisters of power and prestige, and still find one's way to God. I now have a new understanding. I think Jesus was asking: If you had to, could you, would you, give it all away?

And so I gave away my title, money, and power, and at the time I had no assurances of finding a new position, either inside of Siemens or outside. However I had to learn to not be attached to these material objects. And then miraculous additional blessings came my way. First I located a Siemens position that allowed me to continue to live here in Atlanta and have a more balanced life. It had less pay, power, and position; however it allowed me to have a life, so I accepted it. And then after I accepted the position, Siemens gave much of the title, money, and power back to me; and I wasn't asking for it. So, I understand now the message that Jesus was preaching. If you can give it all away, you are then free and paradoxically you don't necessarily have to give it all away. My challenge now will be to remember this great lesson of life, to not be attached, and to keep my soul and life balance. L

Dedication and Blessing
Communication Center

Several decades ago, in a classroom in Olney Hall, a giant was born.

At first, it was tiny and almost inconsequential, but it quickly grew—and grew—thanks to a steadily increasing diet of student interest and faculty expertise.

Now, at the tender age of 25, it towers as one of La Salle's most reputable, and popular, programs. Today, the Communication Department, once just one faculty member, a couple courses, and a handful of faithful students, has the highest student enrollment of any program on campus—and boasts an amazing roster of alumni who are making their marks in all aspects of the business.

"Our graduates are now traveling all over the world, living in Japan, London, Germany," said Brother Gerry Molyneaux, F.S.C., '58, co-founder and Chair of the department. "They're not just anchors on the nightly news, but also lawyers, doctors—one coaches astronauts and another teaches doctors how to communicate."

Things got rolling with the arrival of this professor who loved movies and knew a lot about communication. Br. Gerry began teaching at La Salle in 1973. He started out with film studies and speech courses that were offered through the English Department. But he saw an interest among students for much more of the same.

Professors from other departments soon got involved, adding their expertise to the mix. Courses such as interpersonal communication and public relations writing were created, helping to form a bonafide Communication major by 1977, although still under the auspices of the English Department, and still sharing space in Olney Hall.

"Some people saw it as a passing fancy; it would be here for a few years and then go," Br. Gerry said, noting that people's opinions were fueled by the recent demise of a fledgling Drama major.

"Bob Vogel, Sid MacLeod, and I used to plot and plan how we were going to do it." Vogel is an education professor who taught Communication classes in the early days of the program. MacLeod is a Communication professor who started out teaching public speaking and theater, and later moved into television production.

It was MacLeod who saw the potential of the Audio Visual Department's TV studio in the basement of Olney Hall, turning it into a teaching tool with real world applications. Today, La Salle students and Producer Tonya Ellis, '95, M.A. '02, run the University's own cable TV station, Channel 56, which broadcasts to 300,000 homes all over the city. Among the University's other local competitors, only Drexel University maintains a comparable station.

"... La Salle Communication students are very heads-up when it comes time to get a job. They're competent, reliable, self-motivated, and eager to learn."

By the late '70s, the program was gaining recognition and spreading out. Dr. Richard Goedkoop, now Director of the Master of Arts in Professional Communication, joined the staff as a professor of broadcasting. Bill Wine, now a film critic for KYW NewsRadio 1060, started as a part-time writing professor, and later, a full-time film professor.

One of the strengths—and weaknesses—of the major back then was its broad scope. Students who planned on a career in public relations were required to take TV production, film studies, and other seemingly unrelated courses. This led to the formation of tracks in the mid-1980s, and an amicable and very necessary split with the English Department. Communication majors, who then outnumbered the rest of the English majors, finally had their own department.

The tracks—human communication, mass communication, public relations, and writing—were much more specific than the old major, but still required students to round out their education with a sampling of the other arts. (Film studies was later added to the tracks.) Also new to the curriculum was an Ethics capstone course, in which students from all tracks got together to discuss a variety of communication concerns.

Br. Gerry points out one of the big difference between La Salle's Communication program and others across the country is its strong grounding in liberal arts: It is not a "professional program."

"The idea attached to a professional program is that the only reason behind it is to get a job. That's not the case with us. We're trying to create graduates who are bright, speak well, and write well. ... They pick up the practical stuff on the job and during internships."

"They're big and we're not. The average class size is about 20 students," Br. Gerry said, comparing our intimate teaching environment to the packed lecture halls of some local universities. "Yet while we're smaller, we have the same equipment as bigger schools, and students can get at it a lot easier."

The Communication Department's internship program is another strength. Br. Gerry said the major television and radio stations in the Philadelphia region have relied on the quality of La Salle interns for 20 years. Many students have gone from internships to full-time jobs at locations all over the area. And, in return, many alumni working in communications are happy to sponsor new internships. Comcast and NFL Films are just a couple examples of that reciprocation.

By 1985, the Department totaled 200 students and eight or nine faculty members. The new curriculum and track program had kicked in, and classroom space was at a premium. Luckily, the University had purchased a tract of land south of the main campus that included a convent and Ukrainian orphanage, both with dwindling populations. The orphanage got a revamp in the early 1990s, and the department moved in. "Everything was now under one roof," Br. Gerry said. "All the faculty were together—the classrooms, studios and office space—everything we did was in the building."

The building offers a state-of-the-art TV studio, an audio studio, four editing rooms with equipment, a screening room, nine classrooms, and office space. A student lounge was added with financial support from the Argenziano family, in memory of Communication major Greg Argenziano, who died in 1993.

Today's ever-growing faculty stay on top of advances by attending regular workshops and seminars held on- and off-campus. Many are known experts in their fields, frequently publishing articles and books, presenting papers, and giving lectures. Still, they stay very involved with their students, holding office hours at least six hours a week. Even after graduation, students and faculty maintain a connection that involves lots of e-mails and campus visits.

Not satisfied to stay local, the program is branching out to other countries. Graduate Communication now offers a program in Prague, and an exchange program may soon begin with students from Lugano, Switzerland.

Br. Gerry said the next great milestone—and hurdle—for the department will be converting the TV station to digital over the next few years in order to comply with federal regulations. That will require all new equipment, too, he noted.

Student enrollment in Communication has more than doubled to about 480 since the big move. Graduate Communication, which began with 10 students in 1994, now has 100. "But we're still not our own school. We're not sure we want to be, either. That might separate us too much from liberal arts and diminish the great advantage of a well-rounded education," Br. Gerry said.

"The evaluations we get back from our internships and co-ops say that La Salle Communication students are very heads-up when it comes time to get a job. They're competent, reliable, self-motivated, and eager to learn. And that's exactly what we want to hear."

Editor's Note: On the following pages, we have included a small sampling of Communication alumni. With the help of Br. Gerry and the rest of the department, we've tried to highlight several success stories—both personal and professional—while also pointing out some of the best features of La Salle's Communication program. In future issues of the magazine, we hope to continue presenting these stories, and we ask alumni to share them with us. Please send your ideas to the Office of Alumni Relations, 1900 W. Back in my day, the Communication major was a general Communication major. We got a taste of everything: TV, radio, journalism, script writing, etc., and I honestly believe it's the best way to go. To this day, cameramen who come down to Veterans' Stadium are appreciative when I hold up a piece of white paper for them, and are surprised that I actually know what white-balancing is all about.

The Story Behind the Stories

BY CAITLIN MURRAY

Mike Sielski, '97, a 27-year-old award-winning sports writer for The Allentown Morning Call, doesn't just write about sports; he writes about people. People who happen to play sports.

The best piece he thinks he's written so far—one that earned him an Associated Press Sports Editors Award—was about Mike Fergus, the boys' basketball coach at North Penn High School in Montgomery County. The focus of the story wasn't on the coach's winning record or predictions for the upcoming season. Rather, it detailed the brutal murder of his mother in their hometown of State College, Pa., in 1995. It was a story that hadn't been told—until Sielski got the exclusive.

"I approached him and promised to handle it with dignity and delicacy," recalled Sielski, who was covering local high school sports for The Intelligencer in Bucks County at the time and caught wind of the story through the grapevine.

"I guess he trusted me because he wanted to do it," Sielski said of Fergus, who agreed to make public his painful experience.

Fergus told Sielski of the gruesome details of his mother's murder. He told him how he and his family had to move away from the place they called home in order to start over again, and how he threw himself into coaching to help with the healing process. And he told him how good it felt to talk about it.

Sielski's editor submitted the piece, entitled, "A Coach's Silence," for the AP Sports Editors Award—which, according to Sielski, "is the next best thing to winning a Pulitzer for a sports writer." He took home the prize for best feature story in 2000 in the national competition. Since then, he's earned an honorable mention and the 2001 award for best column writing. Not to mention a slew of other journalism awards and scholarships, including being named one of the Newspaper Association of America's "Top Twenty Under Forty" newspaper people in the country at age 26.

Though he writes about sports for his regular column in The Morning Call, Sielski said he has become less concerned with the scores and stats and more interested in the players.

"As I was growing up, I was always into sports. I was like a walking encyclopedia of facts and figures," remembered the reporter, a Philadelphia sports fanatic since childhood. "Then I got into writing in high school and college, and I really liked it. I found out it's not really writing about sports, but the people who play sports."

He learned this from his mentor and friend, Philadelphia Inquirer sports columnist Bill Lyon.

In the summer before his junior year at La Salle, Sielski—a Communication/English double major and sports columnist (who would go on to become editor-in-chief) for La Salle's student newspaper—wrote a letter to Lyon because he thought "he was the greatest writer [he] ever read." He asked for career advice and tips on how to break into the business.

Lyon never wrote back. Instead, he looked up his young admirer's phone number and called to invite him to a Phillies game. He introduced him to Jim Fergosi, then-manager of the team, Darren Daulton, Jim Eisenreich, and some of Lyon's colleagues at the paper. Sielski was in awe.

"Bill said I had a lot of potential. I really owe him a lot," he said of the man who would later recommend him to the high school sports editor at the Inquirer, where he worked as a stringer for part of his senior year, covering high school football and a few La Salle men's basketball games.

Around that same time, Lyon wrote Sielski a letter of recommendation for a sports journalism scholarship from the National Collegiate Athletic Association and the Freedom Forum. He was one of eight people in the country to win. Sielski framed that letter.

It seems Lyon was right about the potential he saw in the aspiring sports journalist.

In May of 1997, the 3.99 dean's list student was delivering the commencement address at his graduation from La Salle, urging fellow graduates to make something of themselves and seize opportunities that come their way. A year later, he was accepting the award for the best reporter in his graduating class from Columbia University's Graduate School of Journalism.

Today, he's writing his own column for a paper with a circulation of 150,000.

"God, this beats working for a living," Sielski joked. "This is all I ever wanted to do and I get to do it. I'm lucky because I knew that. I feel really blessed." L

Getting Hooked

BY JON CAROULIS

“Joe Nardelli, '78, was La Salle University's first Communication major. He arrived as a Biology major, and while taking an English course with Dr. James Butler, '65, he made a short film for a class project. “That hooked me on film-making,” recalled Nardelli, who switched to Communication when the department was started in 1977.

“There was a lot of momentum building in the department at the time,” said Nardelli, a New Jersey native who lives in New York City and works on both coasts.

The short film for Butler's class (made with classmate Ande Mineo, '80) was about the atrocities of war and depicts a soldier treated by an army medic (played by Nardelli).

In Brother Gerry Molyneaux's, '58, Film as Art course, he made a movie called “Trial Run,” which won the department's “Charlie Award” for best student film that year.

“He soon became the point man of the film movement on campus,” Br. Gerry said. “He won a couple of Charlie Awards, then produced a 30-minute, eight millimeter movie with sound. He did it as professionally as he could, even feeding the cast and crew. He arrived at the film's premiere in the Student Union in a tuxedo. Loads of students worked on the films.”

“In light of his success and commitment to educating and helping people, we gave him the Shining Star Award. He is one of just a half dozen alumni to win that award,” Br. Gerry said.

Despite the switch in interests, Nardelli said, “La Salle was a place where I was challenged every step of the way. Especially by Br. Gerry. And thank God for that or I may have lost interest long before ever having a chance to discover the child in myself.

La Salle was

my “Never Never Land.”

Nardelli went to graduate school at NYU, where he worked and studied with classmates Spike Lee and Ang Lee. He later produced music videos for Miles Davis, Anita Baker, and Branford Marsalis that Spike Lee directed. He also won the Mobile Award for Excellence in Filmmaking for his thesis film, “Sub Shoppe.”

Nardelli, on the eve of his long form video release, poses on 7th Avenue in New York City.

He's also earned two Billboard Music Video Awards, and a 1996 Parents' Choice Silver Honor Group Film Award for “MY HAIR'S FALLING OUT...Am I Still Pretty?,” an educational video to help children understand cancer which played on PBS. He later co-founded CancerEd, a school-based cancer awareness workshop initiative.

Nardelli, who had a play produced off-Broadway in New York, said, “I have come to accept that I may, in fact, be 60 by the time I get to direct my first feature film, but I'm eventually going to do just that. When the time is right, it will happen for me. I have always been lucky that way.” L

I can frankly say that I utilize my Communication education daily. Subsequent to La Salle, I earned both a Doctor of Medicine degree and a Master in Business Administration; however, the skills I learned at La Salle are by far the ones on which I rely most heavily in my career. Ironically, this most enjoyable, interesting, and memorable stage of my education has also proved to be the most valuable.

Opening Doors

BY CAITLIN MURRAY

Historian and philosopher Joseph Campbell said that if you follow your bliss, you put yourself on a kind of track, which has been there all the while waiting for you, and the life that you ought to be living is the one you are living. Karen Garman, Ed.D., '82, has turned this teaching into a motto for how she lives her life.

"Every time you take a risk, it opens up a door that you didn't know was there," said Garman, a medical education consultant and national expert in the field of leadership development and mentoring. She said she's been following her bliss for almost 25 years now.

It all began in 1979 when the freshman Finance major heard about a newly developed program on campus that was just starting its third year. "I saw a new program with a lot of excitement and changed my major to this thing called Communication," recalled Garman, a double major in Communication and Marketing.

Open door number one.

By the time she had reached her junior year, Garman was the Assistant Director of La Salle's Audio Visual office, was involved in a video magazine started by other Communication majors, helped form a student Communication society, and was part of the informal on-campus "camera crew" for basketball games and other events.

Though she thought her future lay in the world of television production, an internship at Hahnemann University Hospital during her junior year led her down a different path—to door number two.

Garman worked as a video engineer and camera operator for Hahnemann's television network, which was being used to educate medical students in upstate Pennsylvania with the same curriculum that was being used at the hospital's main campus in Philadelphia. When she graduated from La Salle a year later, her supervisor asked her to stay on as a full-time video engineer.

"I didn't know what was going to happen when I took the internship at Hahnemann. Medicine was always in the back of my head as an area I was interested in, so I just followed my heart," said Garman, whose interest in medicine dates back to her childhood when she was often in and out of hospitals due to her asthma. "As a result of the internship, I got hired; it opened a door for me."

According to Garman, using video as a teaching tool was pretty innovative at the time. As she continued to produce training programs for allied health professionals and med students for Hahnemann, she became more and more interested in this burgeoning field, and in learning how to use the media to teach adult learners. So much so that she decided to go back to school to earn a Master's degree in Instructional Design.

Open door number three.

After graduating from Temple in 1985, Garman was recruited to the University of Medicine and Dentistry in New Jersey to head up their new Department of Educational Resources. She spent five years helping to get their training programs up and running before she was ready for another risk.

Knowing that she needed a terminal degree to continue to work in medical education, she decided to go back to school again—this time for a degree in adult learning and medical education. Only three places in the country offered such a program. One of them was the University of Southern California (USC) in Los Angeles, where her brother Ralph Garman, '86, had moved to follow his dream of breaking into television and radio.

Open doors four, five, and six.

"People thought I was out of my mind when I moved all the way to California to go to graduate school. They kept asking when I was coming home and I didn't think I was," said Garman, a Northeast Philadelphia native who has remained on the West coast ever since.

After completing her doctoral studies in 1994, Garman was recruited to the University of California San Diego (UCSD) School of Medicine to serve as Assistant Dean for Curriculum and Director of the Office of Learning Resources. Since then, she has worked for Kaiser Permanente, America's largest non-profit HMO, and recently started her own company called HELP, short for Healthcare, Education, Leadership, and Performance. Now a consultant with two associate professor appointments at USC and UCSD, she works with healthcare leaders in their approaches to communication and training issues and has garnered national recognition for helping healthcare organizations establish formal mentoring programs for new physicians.

"They say that people have nine careers these days before they retire. I think I'm one of those examples. I'm probably on career five now," Garman said jokingly. "I never kidded myself into thinking that I knew what was next. Only in taking the risk and trying something new did a new opportunity present itself to me. You couldn't predict back in 1982 that healthcare would be where it is today. You could never have written a job description for what I do today. I learned very quickly that when I followed my bliss, it always turned into a very good thing. La Salle gave me the safe environment to follow my bliss, and that follows me wherever I go." L

Real World Experience

BY JON CAROLIS

Part-way through her senior seminar in public relations, Erin McDermott, '00, realized something a little daunting: "There are people who are counting on you to help them!"

She and her La Salle classmates were working on a PR campaign for Special People in the Northeast (SPIN), a group that provides services for children and adults with disabilities. SPIN's biggest fundraiser is a combination auction-dinner held once a year, and McDermott and her colleagues were trying to find ways to increase participation for the event.

"I've had seven different classes from La Salle," said Megan Forrestal, Director of Public Relations for SPIN. "They bring positive energy to the projects."

Forrestal said McDermott's group set several goals about increasing participation and media coverage. They targeted a region of the city that had not participated in the auction before, and wanted 10 new businesses from that area to donate items. Forrestal said the group chose Chestnut Hill, and got their 10 donations. "Their news releases got some newspaper and radio coverage for the event, too," she said.

Each year, senior students in the Communication Department's Public Relations Track work on campaigns for area non-profit and service organizations. It's a win-win: students get real-world experience, and the organizations, which have limited resources, get extra help.

"One student told me her seminar was a life-changing experience," said Michael Smith, Associate Professor of Communication, who along with fellow Associate Professor Lynne Texter, teaches the seminar. Texter has been partnering public relations students with nonprofits since she came to La Salle in 1989. Smith is head of the National Communication Association Service-Learning Task Group, which promotes the use of service learning in the communication discipline.

This semester, one student group is working with Turner Middle School on an anti-violence program. Previously, La Salle students worked on anti-blight programs at Turner, and the school won an award from the NBA for community service; the La Salle students were cited for their assistance. La Salle's involvement at Pastorius Elementary School was part of the reason the school's SAT test scores increased by 30 percent.

A few years ago, Chris Pinto, '99, and Jana Adams, '99, were recognized at the national meeting for Gilda's Club for the comprehensive communication plan they developed in Texter's seminar. Their proposal for the local chapter of Gilda's Club was used as a model for all other chapters nationwide.

Other groups that have benefited from La Salle's students include The Good Shepherd Mediation Center; The Clean Air Council of Philadelphia and The Bethesda Project (a homeless advocacy group); the American Stroke Association; and the Heartfelt Homily Campaign, which sought to get health messages to the African American community around La Salle through churches.

For McDermott, who now works in public relations at The Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, the "real-world" experience was invaluable, professionally and personally. "We did 'mock' situations in class, and they provided an invaluable foundation, but we were working with real deadlines at SPIN," she said. "It helped to have that kind of pressure. We also learned that the skills we have are needed by people." L

Today, I jump at the opportunity to return to the Com Center for career days and workshops. I find great joy in meeting the communication professionals of tomorrow. When I return, I witness the same passion and energy that were the hallmarks of the department during my days as a student.

Never Give Up

BY KIMBERLY DUGAN

Editor's Note:

While a Communication major at La Salle University, Michele (Klein) Valkov, '92, earned an internship at NFL FILMS. From the start she was told there were no "real" job openings for her after she graduated. Despite her disappointment, Valkov did not throw in the towel. Her drive paid off and for the past 10 years, she has been Producer/Director of Public Relations at NFL FILMS. La Salle Magazine staff writer Kimberly Dugan asked Valkov about how she turned her internship into a career and about her experiences working for NFL FILMS.

Q: Through your internship experience, you earned a position at NFL FILMS when there was no position to be earned. What did you do that caught people's attention and ultimately landed you a job that was created just for you?

A: I spent every waking moment at NFL FILMS: I voluntarily turned myself into an indentured servant. Day and night, I was in every room of the film studio asking questions and learning—in edit suites, in graphics, in the music suites, in film processing, and on the sound stage. But ultimately, as I later found out, NFL FILMS President Steve Sabol passed by an office filled with several producers huddled in front of a monitor watching an amateur tape I'd produced, "A Woman's View of Pro Football," as a final project for graduation. Three months later, I was on the White House lawn interviewing Dee Dee Myers, the first woman White House Press Secretary, on why she loved football. With bomb dogs sniffing at my high heels, a sound crew rigging my microphone, and a $48 paycheck for the day, I had made the "big time." Lights. Camera. Action!

Q: What is it like being a top-level woman executive in such a male-dominated industry?

A: Educational. Entertaining. And enraging. Regardless of gender, I'm privileged to work alongside some of the most brilliant and talented people in the film and television industry today. So, when every single one of the projects related to NFL FILMS' 300 hours of annual programming comes flying across my desk, there is always something learned and always, thankfully, something funny! However, there are some gender-specific idiosyncrasies that influence my work environment. (These are just my observations and do not reflect the beliefs of the National Football League, NFL FILMS, or even my family.) Men can more easily recall, exclaim, and exalt the number of yards run by the league's leading rusher, whereas I remember more about the rusher's personality or life story. In many pre-meeting settings or even just tangential work conversations, men not only like to talk about themselves more, but are more apt and eager to share how they've arrived at their particular conclusions or observations rather than inquiring how those around them arrived at theirs. (This is not necessarily a character flaw or a "bad thing," since, thank heaven, most of what's said in our shop is quite compelling, but 10 years of anecdotal evidence has shown me this dynamic much too often.) Overall, NFL FILMS is a fantastic, unique blend of creative and corporate culture. Like the former Buffalo Bills' coach once said to his team at Super Bowl, "Where would you rather be than right here, right now?"

Q: From a public relations standpoint, can you discuss any pivotal moments in your career that put your crisis management skills to the test?

A: I'm lucky that NFL FILMS' 40 years' worth and 82 Emmys' worth of fine programming pedigree rarely puts me in a reactive PR mode: I'm usually proactive—pitching angles, features, special events, marketing, business objectives. But you never forget the unexpected critical times when you have an obligation to your profession and your company to perform at a highly sensitized level: on alert and employing the maximum anticipatory and execution skills. A good example of one of these times was during the O.J. Simpson case.

NFL FILMS President, Steve Sabol, was the last person to interview O.J. Simpson just six days before his wife Nicole was murdered. He inadvertently mentioned that fact to a local reporter. Soon, I was flooded with requests for the interview from media around the world who wanted copies to air within the hour and they also wanted to interview Steve. Remembering those few days after the famous white Bronco chase—the tension, disbelief, and anxious pitch of the country was unparalleled. As a PR pro, I had to determine a few things. Did I want to add to that? Was NFL FILMS—the romantic historians of the NFL—the appropriate organization to be involved in this? What could we say or show of a 60-minute raw tape? But it was news and a chance to position our company as official, responsible historians. So, until the wee hours of the morning, I personally transcribed the tape, and edited some banal sound bites that could in no way be sensationalized or manipulated by the media. Then I granted only one interview with Steve Sabol to one reporter, CNN's Michael Okwu. Steve and I prepared talking points that only spoke to O.J. Simpson's place in NFL history and his performance on the field. We would not comment on anything else except to say that we interviewed the former Hall of Fame Bills' running back six days prior and gave them use of the Simpson edited interview. The piece aired with dignity and historical relevance without sensation. My objectives of how to position Steve Sabol were met: He was presented as a celebrated interviewer with exclusive access, and an NFL historian who has only one priority on his mind—preserving the history and passion of pro football. Tune in Tomorrow

BY JON CAROLLIS

During the holiday shopping season last year, Steve Martin, '04, a junior philosophy major, was at a mall when a complete stranger came up to him and said, "Hey, I know you! You're on that awful, awful game show, I watch it all the time!"

That's probably a compliment, but it shows the power of television, specifically La Salle 56, the University's cable TV station. Martin's "admirer" was referring to a show produced by La Salle students.

Granted an educational access license by the City of Philadelphia, the station produced 120 shows last year, involving more than 100 students, many of them communication majors. Shows are supervised by Sid MacLeod, Assistant Professor of Communication, and by Station Manager Tonya Ellis, '95, M.A. '02. Every household in Philadelphia that has cable TV has access to the station.

"I don't have any way of finding out who watches the shows," says Ellis, but on Sundays there's a way to get an idea of what's happening. The Archdiocese of Philadelphia tapes a Mass at Channel 6's studios.

Ellis picks up a copy of the taped Mass so La Salle 56 can rebroadcast it at 10 a.m. on Sundays. Sometimes the tapes have glitches in them. "If there's a problem on re-broadcasting the Sunday Mass, I get lots of phone calls and e-mails," says Ellis.

The most regular programs are sports-related, taped once a week. There are also interview shows, programs on health-related topics, and some done strictly for entertainment values, such as "Q&A" (a combination of "The Match Game," Trivial Pursuit and "Name That Tune").

"One of 56's most unique shows was "The Eriq La Salle Show," Ellis said. "It was a comedy that aired about three years ago. Eriq La Salle is the actor who played Peter Benton on "ER." The show had nothing to do with him, but used his name and photo for the name/logo. The producer/host was Kevin Wildes, and his co-host was a Chutes and Ladders game piece named "Alfonso."

"They went to the Philly Auto show and asked car reps when there would be flying cars," says Ellis.

"On another show, one guest won a giant check from a quiz Kevin gave, and then they followed the guest around from banks to MAC machines as he tried to cash this giant-sized check."

The station tapes in a high-tech studio in the Communication Department building on south campus, featuring an air-conditioned control booth, a battery of lights and several cameras. It's a big step up from Ellis' student days, when she had to carry bulky, portable cameras to shoot in the Student Union Building or in conference rooms.

But with bigger facilities, come bigger expectations.

"I get many e-mails from those who think we should look as good as the network affiliates in the city," says Ellis. L

At the heart of this congratulatory message is a deeply felt thank you. You see, now a teacher myself, whenever I stand in front of a classroom, I draw on the lessons that I learned from all my instructors in the department. Actually, it goes beyond what I learned to how I learned it. How Bill Hall taught me to rigorously exchange ideas, not passively relay them. How Lynne Texer showed me that respect for students is as important as respecting their opinions. And how Br. Gerry Molyneaux, '58, demonstrated that the best professors have a passion for what they teach—and that great teachers make darn good friends.

Making the Transition

BY KIMBERLY DUGAN

During her sophomore year at La Salle University, Eileen Matthews, '81, was faced with one of the toughest decisions she ever had to make.

She had entered La Salle as a theatre major, but when the program failed to thrive, she made the easy transition to the then brand new Communication program. During her sophomore year, she thought she should transfer to a different school with a more established program so she could follow her dream of landing a job in broadcasting.

"I hated to leave La Salle. I loved it there. I was very involved on campus and I loved my teachers and my classes, but I felt that the program was in the beginning stages, and if I was really serious about going into broadcasting, I needed to go somewhere that had a more developed curriculum," Matthews said.

So she transferred to Penn State's main campus for her junior year.

"At the end of my junior year at Penn State, I was offered an internship at Channel 10 [in Philadelphia]. I took it immediately and decided to transfer back to La Salle for my senior year because that's where I wanted to graduate from," she said.

While at Penn State, Matthews was taught by Dr. Richard Goedkoop, the current Director of La Salle's Graduate Program in Professional Communication. Coincidentally, Goedkoop left Penn State for La Salle the same year Matthews transferred back.

"We have a little joke going about how we brought each other back to La Salle," said Matthews, who took a class with Goedkoop her senior year. "I was so happy to be back."

Matthews is credited as the first Communication major from La Salle to make it into broadcasting. She turned her internship at WCAU-TV as a researcher into a full-time job, then worked her way up the ranks at Channel 10 from researcher, to associate producer, to producer.

In the 10 years that she worked at

Today, Matthews and her husband Dan Sitarski are owners and executive producers of Segue Productions, an independent production company in Gulph Mills, Pa. Segue specializes in documentary and special programming for broadcast, cable, and industrial clients—including the Telly Award winning program, "The Best Of," a prime time series that premiered on the Food Network in 1999 and airs four nights a week. It is a top-rated magazine show that takes viewers to five states in 30 minutes in search of the best of everything from fine dining spots to pizza and hot dogs.

"Right now I have about 40 people working for me all over the country," she said. "When we first started I was on the road most of the time. I was eating a lot of food and putting in 13-hour days. Now I'm on the road about four weeks out of the year, so I do most of my work from home, which allows me to spend more time with my two children. I spend all day e-mailing and putting out fires when emergencies come up—like all good executive producers should."

Despite her busy schedule, Matthews still finds time to devote to her alma mater.

"I love coming back to campus and meeting with the new students interested in the Communication program. It is tremendous how much the program has grown and developed over the years," she said. "I also go back and speak to students at my old high school [Archbishop Ryan] and I continue to beat the drum for La Salle." L

Eileen Matthews, '81, Executive Producer, Segue Productions

WCAU, Matthews produced a variety of prime time special programs—two of which earned her multiple Emmy™ awards. The first, a magazine show called "KIDSIDE" that looked at the world from a kid's perspective, won six Emmys™ and the other, "The Adventures of Ritzzy the Wolf," which taught children about such topics as the environment and geography, earned her two more.

"The first time I was nominated for an Emmy™ was in 1984. Unfortunately, I didn't win, but I remember the thrill of being nominated," said Matthews, who has earned a total of nine local Emmys™ and several international awards.

Make a Difference

BY KIMBERLY DUGAN

People who perform community service usually say they get more out of it than they give—but what exactly do they get? Well, among other things, a sense of fulfillment, the knowledge that they can make a difference, and the satisfaction of giving their time to a worthy cause.

Kelly (Burke) Laflamme, '93, and Dan DeLuca, '94, got all of that and much more—they discovered their careers.

Laflamme and DeLuca signed up to become members of Lasallian Volunteers, a national program that asks participants to commit to a year of service post graduation. The program sends volunteers to different parts of the country to live and work in Christian Brothers' communities. Many of the volunteers teach in Brothers' schools, while others work in soup kitchens, after-school programs, or fundraising offices.

"I felt a need to do something for others," said Laflamme. "While at La Salle I was involved in Project Appalachia, where we spent Spring Break building homes for the underprivileged. I wanted to do more and that is when I decided to join Lasallian Volunteers. I thought that would fulfill my need, but instead it led me down a completely different path."

"I really wasn't community service driven during college," said DeLuca. "Although I had always been interested in journalism, I wasn't sure what I wanted to do after graduation. I heard about the Lasallian Volunteers program and decided it was a great opportunity for me to give something back while at the same time discover what it was I really wanted to do." Laflamme and DeLuca were sent to Christian Brothers' schools to become teachers for their first year of service.

Laflamme taught at a school in Mississippi, while DeLuca was stationed in Missouri.

After their first year, both volunteers decided to enroll for another year. Laflamme went to a second placement in the South Bronx where she applied her communication skills to fundraising and public relations work for a community-based non-profit organization. During DeLuca's second term, he was sent to Greenville, Miss., where he continued to teach.

By the time they were finished, each had put in three years of service.

"Through the experience, I made it my personal mission to be of service," said Laflamme, now a Program Assistant at the Annie E. Casey Foundation, a national organization that works to build better futures for disadvantaged children and their families.

"I believe we can influence positive outcomes for children by strengthening their communities. I use the communication and public relations skills I learned at La Salle to help do this everyday," Laflamme added.

After completion of his service, DeLuca thought he would continue teaching. He moved to Florida and taught for six months when an opportunity to break into the business of journalism presented itself.

"I got the chance to work for a newspaper, and I figured if I was ever going to try my hand at journalism it was time," said DeLuca, who started working for a weekly newspaper in 1999.

"I credit the volunteer program for giving me the confidence to take a risk and try to make a career out of reporting," said DeLuca, who now works for The News-Press, a daily newspaper in Fort Myers, Fla., as a sports and business reporter. "Being a part of Lasallian Volunteers made me feel like a success and that I could achieve anything." L

Mastering the Art of Communication

BY JON CAROLIS

Never afraid of a challenge—or expansion—the La Salle Communication program has continuously kept growing and spreading out.

The Master of Arts in Professional Communication began in 1994, the same time the department's new building on south campus was opening.

Dr. Richard Goedkoop, its director, says since then, professionals from a variety of backgrounds—healthcare, marketing, K-12 teachers, collegiate administration—have enrolled.

"We get people from many different walks of life, who use communication in business and professional settings," says Goedkoop.

The program includes core courses in writing, speaking, theory, research, and ethics. Elective areas of study include such subjects as Public Relations, Conflict Management, Organizational Communication, Interpersonal Communication, and Communication Management in Media and Public Relations.

While emphasizing theory and methods in core courses, students are encouraged to apply the communication principles they learn to professional situations. In 2001, the program began offering a 15-credit certificate program, and last

The one language they're learning to learn, though, is "public relations-ese."

Thirteen years ago, the Czech Republic, like most Eastern European countries, did not have a free media. Now, after the Velvet Revolution, they not only have a free media, but also a burgeoning public relations industry—an industry that will have to work internationally, as Prague is fast becoming an international business center. La Salle partnered with the University of New York, Prague (UNYP) to begin offering graduate education programs in Prague.

There were administrative challenges, says Smith, but also some interesting feedback. The program's executive style of classes, all-day classes on weekends, worked so well in Prague that the department will start offering executive style classes in its program at La Salle's main campus.

And while the students in Prague and Philadelphia might be worlds away physically, there are similarities common to the art of communication. Getting the right message to the right audience is critical, regardless of the language. L year, the program spread out to Prague.

Dr. Michael

Smith heads up the new international program, and has flown to the city several times to teach.

He says his students have a good working knowledge of English, which is taught as a second language.

In the true pioneering spirit of my internship at WCAU-FM, I performed the regular tasks that interns do such as get coffee, edit tape, and help organize the music library. But it was the daily contact with the disc jockeys, the news anchors, and station management that helped mold my career in this industry. Anyone could learn to edit tape and file music; it was the interaction with these legends of broadcasting that provided me the motivation to pursue a career in the wonderful world of radio.

I think I knew during my first day on the job, at my first television station, in December of 1985, that I was not in over my head. There, right before my eyes, was the exact same brand of editing equipment that I had worked with for the past four years at La Salle University. Simply put, the technology that was used in the world of professional broadcasting was the same as what I had trained on during my time as a Communication major at 20th and Olney.

An Unmatched Opportunity

BY KEVIN DOUGHERTY, '02

Kevin Dougherty, '02 (right), and Mike Trainor, '04, at Eagles Training Camp in August 2002.

For any true Philadelphia Eagles fan, nothing can replace this season's disappointment of not reaching the Super Bowl. But as I sit under a swaying palm tree looking out at the blue Hawaiian Ocean with a Mai Tai in hand, the pain seems a bit easier to endure. This reward is one of the many perks of working in the NFL.

As a member of the Eagles' video department, I, along with the rest of the Eagles' coaching and football operations staff, have been invited to work as the NFC staff in this year's Pro Bowl in Honolulu as a consolation for another terrific season. This experience is just another in what has been two unforgettable years in my life, which began back at La Salle University.

For the past 25 years, La Salle University's Communication Department has been providing hundreds of young men and women unique opportunities in many different fields. I am not an exception.

During my junior year at La Salle, at a time when my career goals were changing by the month, I was taking a Film as Art course with Brother Gerry Molyneux, F.S.C., '58.

One day after class, Br. Gerry pulled me aside and asked whether or not I was interested in an internship opportunity with the Eagles' video department. I thought it was a joke, but he was serious. Brother knew I was a diehard Eagles fan and thought the internship would be a great way for me to fix myself on a certain communication field. My decision to follow Br. Gerry's advice was one of the smartest I have ever made. After working as an intern for the Eagles' video department during the 2001 season, I was hired as just the third full-time video member the team has ever employed.

The video department's job is to film, edit, and prepare all tapes for the coaching staff. Whether a coach wants to see the entire game from the previous week or just the third down passes, it is our responsibility to ensure he gets it. When the team practices every Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday during the season, Mike Dougherty, our video director, and I, are out filming the practice drills, while Tom Carmody, the assistant director, is inside digitizing all of the drills into our Avid computer system. As a result, we guarantee the coaches can see the entire practice as soon as they return to their offices.

The Eagles' video department and La Salle's Communication Department have had a long, solid relationship. Video director Mike Dougherty has been turning to Br. Gerry for many years now in search of quality interns. In fact, Frank Faber, '88, whom Mike Dougherty calls his "oldest intern," still works every Eagles game printing pictures for the coaches. In addition to Faber and me, Mike Dougherty has had five other La Salle interns (Joe Lopez, '95; Terry McAneney '95; Pat Taggart, '01; Keith Anderson, '02; and Mike Trainor, '04). Like myself, Anderson was hired into the NFL by the Cleveland Browns' video department just before graduating.

One of the many thrills of interning and working for the video department is accompanying the team to all games, both home and away. Over the past two seasons, I have been to San Francisco, Seattle, Phoenix, Chicago, Jacksonville, and many other cities throughout the country. While there is plenty of difficult, challenging work to be done, the opportunity to work in the NFL is unmatched. It is an opportunity I would have never known without the guidance and support of La Salle's Communication Department. L

La Salle is different from other universities I've attended. La Salle's teachers are more committed to teaching. And in the Communication Department, alumni were active and involved in and out of the classroom. I remember several people in particular who played a big part in my life at La Salle. Paul Perrello, '79, taught Radio Production and spent countless hours advising us how to run and improve WEXP. Joe O'Neill, '83, helped my brother—a student at Brand X—get an internship. Jan Wiczerzak, '82, helped me with a grad school project several years after I left La Salle.

I was in class on the very first night of the very first class of the Master's Program in Professional Communication when it started in 1994. I remember wondering where my decision to be there was going to take me. I could not have imagined then what has happened! Because of the commitment of the graduate faculty, especially Lynne Texter, Bill Hall, and Mike Smith.

I was inspired to pursue a Ph.D. in Organizational Communication. They committed themselves to my success. More importantly, they were great role models of how to be a good teacher and researcher. Now, I am teaching graduate and undergraduate students. I hope I am as good a role model to my students as the Communication faculty at La Salle was to me.

UnsungHERO

BY KIMBERLY DUGAN

According to the American Medical Association, over four million women are victims of severe assaults by boyfriends or husbands each year—which means one in four women is likely to be abused by a partner in her lifetime.

Sadly, La Salle student Carmen Arroyo represents that “one in four.”

Her story is not one of despair, though. It is a shining example of how abused women can survive, and thrive.

Arroyo, who received her Associate’s degree in social work and is working on her Bachelor’s degree from La Salle University, is a survivor of domestic abuse, and a hero to her children and those she now helps in her community.

She was recently featured on a WB17 News segment entitled, “Unsung Heroes,” which recognizes men and women with remarkable stories of endurance.

Originally from Puerto Rico, Arroyo fled to the United States with her four children in 1994 to escape an abusive husband.

“My husband beat me and he threatened my children. He tried to kill me and I knew I had to get away for the safety of my children,” said Arroyo, who received 90 stitches in her face as a result of one of her husband’s attacks.

Upon arriving in Philadelphia, Arroyo stayed with her sister. She was suffering from physical injuries and emotional and mental scars.

“When I first came to this country I was in crisis,” she said. “I was depressed and scared, and I didn’t want anyone to see my face because of what my husband had done to it.”

“One day, not long after I arrived, my sister’s neighbor saw me crying. She wanted to help me. She told me about Congreso—and I am so glad she did,” Arroyo said.

Congreso, located in North Philadelphia, is a non-profit organization that has been meeting the

As Arroyo made progress through counseling, she decided she wanted to help others the way those at Congreso helped her.

“The people at Congreso wanted to make sure I was fully healed before I took on a full-time job helping others with their problems, so I started doing volunteer work for Congreso’s Latina Domestic Violence program and its advisory board. I had to start out small and prepare myself for a real job,” she said.

In 1997, Congreso hired Arroyo as a full time employee. She was a community organizer for Congreso’s Community Center, which assists over 1,000 women a year. After working for two years, Arroyo entered La Salle and is now well on her way to her Bachelor’s degree.

“I have the life experience behind me to share with others but I want to further my education as another resource to share with people who need my help,” she said.

Today, Arroyo is still working at Congreso as a program coordinator for the infant, child, and home visiting services. Her devotion to others stems from the care she received when she needed it most.

“I am so thankful for the help I received, and I know that through my experience and education, I am able to give back to the community,” Arroyo said. “I love my job. I know that people need me, and I feel blessed to be alive and able to help others,” she said. L health and welfare needs of the Latino community for over 25 years.

“Congreso helped me find housing and sent me to counseling. They also helped me with my language skills—and they even paid for me to have surgery to fix the damage to my face,” Arroyo said.

TEACHING THE POSSIBILITIES

BY KRISTEN A. GRAHAM

Joseph Perez, 13 years old and sure-voiced, knows he is learning in a special place.

In pressed khakis and a crisp blue pullover shirt, the eighth grader is polite, eager, and hungry for knowledge.

Asked what San Miguel, his tiny Christian Brothers school, means to him, Perez does not hesitate. "If I had a son," he says, "I'd want him to go here."

Housed in two floors of Our Lady of Fatima Church in Camden, N.J., the second poorest city in the nation, San Miguel has served middle school boys since 1997. It runs on a shoestring budget, deals in small victories, and aims to give hope to a student body dismissed by many as educational goners.

Brother William Johnson,

E.S.C., '65, San Miguel's principal, points to three factors that make San Miguel different from other schools: small size, with no more than 20 boys in each grade; an extended day, with classes running until 5 p.m.; and a summer program.

But spend five minutes in the place where the second-hand desks and cinderblock walls don't seem to matter and it becomes clear that a number of things make San Miguel special. Students feel cared for. They know their teachers are interested in them. They are taught discipline and structure as well as kindness and the value of education. Parents, who pay $10 monthly tuition, know their sons are challenged and loved as individuals.

That such a mission has thrived in Camden is no small feat.

When the Brothers decided to start a middle school in an impoverished largely Hispanic neighborhood somewhere on the East Coast, Br. William was given the task of finding a city with need and facilities. Camden, with its 50 percent dropout rate, which soars even higher among Hispanic males, seemed the perfect spot.

"We wanted to get back to the mission of the Christian Brothers a little more closely," Br. William said.

In the beginning, educating boys who did not do well in other schools was more than a little challenging—some of San Miguel's first students did not know how to read. And funding is a constant struggle, with about a third of the school's operating budget coming from the Brothers and the other chunk from donations.

No matter, says Br. William. What is important is what students take home—and perhaps, eventually, out of Camden—what the school gives them.

"I think for a lot of students we opened up their sense of what is possible," said Br. William.

That statement leads him to reminisce about one of his favorite San Miguel successes.

One boy, the youngest of many children and one of San Miguel's first graduates, entered the school disdainful of education, unconvinced of its value.

San Miguel changed that.

"He said, 'I'm going to be the first child in my family to graduate high school,'" Br. William said, beaming at the recollection. "The fact that he would say that speaks to what we try to do." L

New Trustees Come On Board

Two prominent alumni, Nicholas J. Lisi, Esq., '62, and William R. Sautter, C.P.A., '71, and a former employee with strong ties to the University, Laura Kind McKenna, M.S.N., CRNP, have been appointed to La Salle University's Board of Trustees. Each will serve a five-year term.

Lisi, a senior partner for the Philadelphia law firm of Padova & Lisi, graduated from La Salle in 1962. He has been involved with many activities at the University, both before and after his graduation, and frequently in leadership capacities. As a student, he served as president of the Residence Hall Council in his senior year, was an officer with the Sigma Phi Lambda fraternity, and co-founded the Saint Thomas More Pre-Law Society at La Salle. From 1997 through 1999, he served as President of the University's Alumni Association. This past November, he was honored with the Alumni Association's John J. Finley, '24, Award for his outstanding service and dedication to La Salle.

"People on the Board have told me I've joined at just the right time, with so many initiatives moving forward at the University," Lisi said. "There are many quality people on the Board, and I'm looking forward to making a meaningful contribution."

Sautter, President and

William R. Sautter, '71

C.E.O. of Elliott-Lewis Corporation in Philadelphia, graduated from La Salle in 1971. He said he experienced déjà vu when he was asked to serve on the Board. "I had the same reaction I had when I was told I was to receive the 2002 Leadership Award (at La Salle's annual Charter Dinner)—I thought they had made a mistake! I'm honored that I was asked."

Sautter said one of the things he'd like to do as a Trustee is to be a spokesperson for the School of Business. "I hope to introduce our faculty and students to corporate leaders in the community, and to make important connections with fundraising."

McKenna, the Managing Trustee for the Patricia Kind Family Foundation (which was recently honored as the Foundation of the Year by the Philadelphia Chapter of the American Association of Fundraising Professionals), served in La Salle's Office of Student Health for 12 years. A family nurse practitioner, she was the Director of Student Health Services when she left in 1998 to manage the family foundation, which was established by her mother, Patricia Kind, with a bequest from McKenna's maternal grandmother.

Nicholas J. Lisi, Esq., '62

Laura Kind McKenna

"I loved working at La Salle; I loved interacting with the students," she said. "It gave me so much. It was a wonderful place to be. We need to work with young people; they're what it's all about." As a member of the Board, she hopes to be an advocate for students and student services.

The School of Business recently held "Economic Outlook 2003," featuring Steve Forbes, President and C.E.O. of Forbes, Inc. and Editor-in-Chief of Forbes Magazine. This annual event, co-sponsored by The Union League of Philadelphia, was completely sold out with over 500 attendees. (From left) Forbes, James J. Lynch, '71, Chairman of the University's Board of Trustees, and University President Brother Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., '70, share a light moment before the luncheon and presentation. Grants Keep La Salle Going Strong

The following are just a few examples of the multitude of grants La Salle University has received over recent months.

The Sallie Mae Fund of the Community Foundation for the National Capital Region awarded La Salle University $20,000 for scholarships for students in the school's BUSCA program, in which Spanish-dominant students take college courses first in Spanish, then in English. The funds will be distributed to current BUSCA students in $2,000 scholarships.

The Ben Franklin Technology Partners of Southeastern Pennsylvania

(BFTP/SEP) awarded the University a grant of $25,000 (matched by the Otto Haas Charitable Trust) for "Invent Investment," a fund encouraging and supporting entrepreneurship at La Salle. Investments up to $10,000 are available for students to develop high-technology, innovation-based, and product-focused businesses. "Invention" was launched by BFTP/SEP, La Salle's Integrated Science, Business, and Technology (ISBT) program, and the School of Business.

The U.S. Department of Education has awarded the University a four-year, $73,256 Child Care Access Means Parents in School (CCAMPIS) grant. This grant, which will be given to a maximum of 10 students, provides childcare subsidies for Pell eligible students with dependent children. It will be administered in partnership with Family Care Solutions, Inc. of Philadelphia.

The Independence Foundation of Philadelphia awarded a $90,000 grant to La Salle's Neighborhood Nursing Center to support primary care services offered at the center's two locations.

The National Science Foundation awarded the University's Math and Computer Science Department a four-year, $398,836 grant for scholarships in computer science, engineering, and math.

The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services awarded La Salle $66,549 for scholarship assistance to disadvantaged students who are pursuing a Bachelor of Science in Nursing on a full-time basis.

The M.A. Program in Bilingual/Bicultural Studies has received a three-year contract up to $180,000 per year from the School District of Philadelphia to offer a professional development certificate program in bilingual education for district teachers and administrators. It is funded by a U. S. Department of Education Title VII grant.

"The Candy Man Can"

Thanks to the generous financial contribution of John E. Glaser, '62, President of Stutz Candy Company, Inc., the Athletics Department now has a newly refurbished Multimedia Room, housed on the mezzanine level of the Hayman Center. This much-needed space is used as a film room for coaches and players, department and team meetings, and for press conferences after basketball games.

At the official dedication of the Multimedia Room on October 28, Glaser encouraged other alumni to give back to their alma mater.

"Like many of you, I bleed blue and gold," Glaser said. "However, I had drifted away from La Salle. As I got closer to the University, I recognized that I could help in certain areas that were dear to me. La Salle basketball and the School of Business, from which I graduated in 1962, are two of those areas."

He continued, "Coach Billy Hahn has instilled his passion, toughness, and never-quit attitude at La Salle.... Brother Michael [President Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., '70] and [Vice President for University Advancement] Brian Elderton have a great vision for La Salle.... We all have a great love for our University and we all need to work as a total team to 'bring back' our many alumni to contribute to the future of La Salle."

New Traditions Begin at Annual Event

The African American Alumni Association's Annual Awards Dinner, held on November 1, honored students and members of the community and produced its largest turnout to date.

"It was an electric night," said Mike Mosley, '82, President of the African American Alumni Association. "We had well over 230 guests attend. The event attracted a wide variety of people and honored those truly deserving of recognition."

Michael Mosley, '82 (right), President of the African American Alumni Association, presents the Warren E. Smith, M.D., '54 Award to Philadelphia Police Commissioner, Sylvester M. Johnson.

In front of a packed house, the 2002 Warren E. Smith, M.D., '54 Award, given to an African American who has achieved success in his or her profession, has demonstrated a commitment to traditional Lasallian values, has made significant contributions to the community, and serves as an outstanding example to all La Salle students, was bestowed upon Philadelphia Police Commissioner Sylvester M. Johnson.

Although the Smith Award has a 13-year history, the first ever Warren

E. Smith, M.D., '54, Scholarship was awarded to two members of the junior class, Paris McLean, '04, and Rega Gamble, '04.

"The giving of the scholarship this year marks the beginning of a tradition," Mosley said. "Each year we will give a scholarship to one or two students who submit an application and essay for consideration, are in good academic standing, and demonstrate a financial need."

Smith, the award's and scholarship's namesake, was one of the first African Americans to graduate from La Salle's pre-med program and served as the University psychiatrist for 15 years before his death in 1990.

Another first for the African American Alumni Awards Dinner was the presentation of the President's Award given to Robert B. Jackson Jr., '73. The President's Award will now be given annually in recognition of outstanding service to the African American Alumni Association.

Four Alumni Enter the Hall

Four outstanding alumni athletes were inducted into La Salle's Hall of Athletes on February 1. The awardees were: Joseph A. Dieterle, D.O., '65, a 1964 and 1965 NCAA All-American in swimming; Randy Woods, '92, the Big Five Hall of Fame inductee who was ranked fifth on La Salle's all-time list of basketball players at the end of his career having scored 1,811 points;

Chrissie Donahue, '97, the first female Explorers' basketball player to start every game in her career, is ranked second in La Salle history with a total of 1,818 points, and third with 914 rebounds, and a Big Five Hall of Fame inductee; Brian A. Schaller, '97, a two-time GTE First Team Academic All-American who batted .415 in 1996, ranking him 22nd nationally among Division I players.

Awarded for Service

A community service theme permeated the Alumni Association Awards ceremony held on November 15. The event, which hosted over 200 people, recognized those who represent traditional Lasallian values and give back to their community.

The John J. Finley, '24, Award was given to John F. Reardon, '59, and Nicholas J. Lisi, Esq., '62. This award is given to alumni who have exhibited outstanding service to La Salle University or the Alumni Association. Both Reardon and Lisi have devoted countless hours of service to La Salle in their respective capacities. Reardon, who retired in May after 40 years of teaching, continues to visit 20 or more high schools each year speaking on behalf of the University. As an alumnus, Lisi was a member of La Salle's Alumni Association for 33 years—holding every key position, including President from 1997 through 1999. This year, Lisi was appointed to a five-year term on La Salle's Board of Trustees.

The Association also awarded the Signum Fidei Medal, whose name originates from the motto of the Christian Brothers, "Sign of Faith," to Kenneth Gamble. The medal is given annually to a person who has made noteworthy contributions to the advancement of humanitarian principles, and Gamble has made giving back to Philadelphia part of his life's work. Although he is widely known for his musical career, Gamble's efforts in public service are equally impressive. In addition to being Chairman and Founder of Clean Up the Ghetto, a nonprofit organization employing youth in cities throughout the nation, he also established Universal Community Homes, which has begun one of the largest community revitalization efforts in the city's history.

As part of the awards ceremony, 51 students were inducted into the

Alpha Epsilon Alumni Honor Society, which recognizes "high scholarship in the pursuit of liberal education in the Christian/Judeo tradition together with the exceptional but unrewarded participation in the extracurricular life of the University."

"It is an honor every year to recognize alumni, students, and members of our community that live the teachings of St. John Baptist de La Salle through their service to the University and their own neighborhoods," said Gerry Binder, '73, President of the Alumni Association.

George Paull: More Than a Good Player

By Bob Vetrone Sr.

If you looked at the basketball statistics for George Paull, '67, who passed away on December 10 at 57, you'd say he was a "pretty good" player—1,016 points in his three varsity seasons, 13.7 points per game, a good defensive player, passer, and rebounder. Not great, but good enough to get him elected into La Salle's Hall of Athletes in 1981.

Go beyond the statistics and you get to what he really was, in his four years at La Salle, and in his future endeavors for his Alma Mater and many other people—great friend.

Paull was very active as a Vice President for the Explorer Club (La Salle Athletics Fund Development and Booster Organization)

Paull was very active as a Vice President for the Explorer Club (La Salle Athletics Fund Development and Booster Organization) during its reorganization in 1997.

during its reorganization in 1997.

At his death, he had become a leader in the Markward Club, one of the few organizations in the nation that honors high school student-athletes. In fact, the night before he left us, he was on the phone to the media announcing this season's first Markward luncheon and the list of players to be honored.

At that meeting two days after his death, a Markward Club pioneer said Paull was his best friend—and this came from a man who has over 1,000 friends.

One of Paull's teammates and among his closest friends was Eddie Burke, '67, who summed it up best in Ted Silary's story in the Philadelphia Daily News:

"George was one of the nicest guys—a happy-go-lucky type—you could ever meet. He would do anything for anybody at any time."

One of the flower settings at the wake at St. James Church on December 12 had a card that read: "From his friends at La Salle."

It could have read: "his loving hundreds of friends at La Salle—and then some."

A Season of Notable Achievements

By Bob Vetrone Sr.

For La Salle's cross country teams and Coach Charles Torpey, it's getting to be a habit—making strong showings in the Atlantic 10 Championships.

For the second straight season and for the third time in four years, the Explorers' men runners outdistanced the field to capture the conference title at Schenley Park, Pittsburgh. Meanwhile, the women were making it two in a row in their title run.

Individually, Academic All-American Todd Witzleben was the Outstanding Male Performer. Also for the second straight season, Sheila Brother John Kane, F.S.C., '80, M.A. '87, Director of Facilities and Operations and Director of Project Teamwork (left), with Cross Country Coach Charles Torpey.

Klick paced the women's victory and was named the Outstanding Female Performer.

For Torpey, ho-hum, another dual Coach of the Year Award—his third in four years with the men and second in a row with the women.

Not only has their success been obvious in the Atlantic 10 and throughout the East, but the Explorers are beginning to be noticed nationally. The men were ranked 30th in the Mondo Division I Cross Country rankings, while the women received some votes during the season.

Individually, Witzleben has concluded a cross country career that saw him earn two trips to the NCAA Championships. He was voted the

Atlantic 10's Outstanding Academic Cross Country Performer, with a 3.44 G.P.A. in Finance.

Witzleben's emergence as a top-grade runner has surprised a lot of observers and, in a small way, Coach Torpey.

"We felt Todd would become a standout for us," Torpey said, "but he exceeded our expectations because he wouldn't become satisfied with himself. He is very tough on himself and it showed in his continuous improvement to where he is now."

Witzleben's cross country career at La Salle is over but he has eligibility remaining in track, so he'll be around to show the younger runners where hard work can get them.

While the Explorer cross country teams were prominent in their success, the men's and women's soccer teams continued to make progress. Each earned a share of individual awards and each finished with 6-5 conference records.

The stellar performance of sophomore goalie Stash Graham from Tampa, Fla., kept the men in the running for an Atlantic 10 Championship berth until the very last weekend of the season, and earned him the Atlantic 10 Defensive Player of the Year accolade. In addition, Graham made Honorable Mention on the College Soccer

Coaches Association All-American and was named to the weekly College Soccer News' National Team. In the classroom, Steve Kohut and Matt Hemberger earned berths on the National Soccer Coaches All-East Scholar Team.

Pat Farrell, a coach who carefully guards his praise, had some for Graham and his teammates:

"Stash is the recipient of a true team award. The other 10 field players performed remarkably well in front of him this year, and Stash was able to meet the challenge when the ball came his way.

"There are a lot of very special players offensively in the Atlantic 10 Conference, but Stash is one of the few very special players the conference has on defense. His ability to play at a high level, game in and game out, has been rewarded."

The women produced an all-timer in Amy Schneider.

The senior from Bristol, Pa., set La Salle career records in scoring (113 points), goals (40), and assists (33) that appear likely to hold up for quite awhile. She was voted to the National Soccer Coaches' All-East Third Team. Academically, Shannon Plunkett made Verizon Academic All-District II.

Schneider also attended the InfoSports Pro Soccer Combine in Florida to display her talents to pro scouts. And though she is gone from the program, her influence lingers.

"Amy's work ethic was second to none," former coach Jeannine Calhoun said, "and between that and her ability, she has left a great impact on our program."

In football, Archie Stalcup picked up his first victory as a head coach when the Explorers beat Siena at McCarthy Stadium on September 28. The season ended on a spectacular note on November 16. The Explorers built an early lead at St. John's, saw it disappear, but then two touchdowns in the final five minutes produced a 45-41 victory.

Sophomore Ken Triboletti netted 243 yards on 24 carries and freshman quarterback Ed Marynowitz concluded an outstanding first year with one touchdown run and a TD pass. He wound up with seven La Salle quarterback records, with the promise of eclipsing those as his career continues.

His emergence and that of Triboletti promised more of the same offensive flair the team showed all season under offensive coordinator and associate head coach Phil Longo.

La Salle Alum Goes Above and Beyond

I just had the opportunity to read the article in La Salle Magazine concerning my nephew, Jackson Oliver's ('03) kidney donation for my son, Austin Sandell (Winter 2002-03, "More Than a Helping Hand," pages 25-26). Thank you for recognizing Jack in your article.

Since the theme of the last issue was about La Salle's contributions to the medical profession, I would also like to point out that Austin was kept alive for 27 years, and through several crises, by La Salle alumnus Donald E. Praiss, M.D., B.S. '54. His care for Austin went far beyond professional competence and responsibility. On one occasion, he referred Austin to Dr. Keith Waterhouse at Downstate Medical Center in New York, then came to New York to assist in the surgery in spite of the gas crisis. He also gave us his home phone to avoid going through the answering service, and accepted only the insurance coverage as payment. Dr. Praiss continuously searched for new solutions for Austin. Without his care and concern, Austin would not be alive today.

Dr. Praiss is one of La Salle's saints.

Grandmother Marie Hicks, '80, An Inspiration

When Marie Hicks, '80, and her four children moved to the neighborhood near Germantown Medical Center in 1964, she came to La Salle University to see if there were any dining hall positions available. She was hired on the spot.

A few years later, co-education at La Salle was instituted. "That was the best news that I had ever heard. I had always wanted to go to college and hoped that one day I would get the chance," said Hicks, who began a long six years of working full-time and taking night classes through Continuing Education for Women in 1974. "I was happy doing that. Those were the best years of my life."

Hicks eventually graduated from La Salle University with a degree in sociology. She then took a job at Mercy Hospice in Center City, as the oldest caseworker at age 56. She worked there until retirement in 1990.

The busy grandmother still volunteers at local nursing homes and elementary schools. "I like doing volunteer work with children. I tell them not to wait to go to college, go while you're still young." She also writes for Scoop U.S.A., a newspaper circulating in the neighborhoods around La Salle, and is writing a book about angels.

Hicks remains involved with the La Salle community as a member of the African-American Alumni Association.

"I believe in education. It is the key that opens doors," said Hicks, who raised two engineers, one attorney, and a Philadelphia schoolteacher. She also stresses education with her two grandchildren, one who is currently enrolled at Syracuse University as an Engineering major, and one who will attend college next fall. "I am a role model for them."

"I feel great," says Hicks, now 79, who sweeps her street everyday and still takes public transportation. "God has been good to me. I am grateful and thankful for that."

Pediatrics. He developed an interest in adolescent eating disorders and has become an acknowledged leader in the field. He is presently the Chief of Adolescent Medicine at Strong Memorial Hospital in Rochester, N.Y.

Richard F. Vaccaro (B.S.) is President and C.E.O. of Valogix, Inc., in Saratoga Springs, N.Y.—a new startup company offering software for advanced planning and forecasting of finished goods and service parts inventories. His first two startups were sold to public companies.

A Pioneer in the Psychology of Creativity

A La Salle alumnus revered as an internationally influential figure in the study of human personality for nearly half a century has passed away. Frank X. Barron, Ph.D., B.A. '42, a World War II veteran and a professor emeritus of psychology at the University of California Santa Cruz, died Oct. 6, 2002, following complications from a fall. He was 80 years old.

Barron was an imaginative designer of innovative personality measures and scales that have helped deepen the world's understanding of personality and personality functioning. In the 1950s and '60s, he and other gifted colleagues at the Institute of Personality Assessment and Research at UC Berkeley designed and carried out pioneering studies of creative writers, architects, research scientists, and mathematicians. These studies still stand as classics in the field of creativity research.

Born in the coal-mining town of Lansford, Pa., he graduated as a philosophy major from La Salle. His interest turned to psychology following a summer job as an attendant in a hospital for the mentally ill. Barron has said of the experience, "I had been interested in philosophy, and suddenly philosophy came alive for me, for here the basic questions of human existence were not abstractions: They were embodied in human suffering."

In addition to many international prizes and honors, Barron was awarded an honorary doctorate from La Salle in 1979.

The Way to Their Brains is Through Their Stomachs

Botany, cellular division, and genetics are all challenging subjects. But an even bigger challenge is trying to get a classroom full of teenage boys interested in these topics.

Mary Scott, B.S. '94, M.Ed. '98, knows how, and has been rewarded for her expertise. Scott is the 2002 recipient of the Outstanding Biology Teacher in Pennsylvania honor from the National Association of Biology Teachers. As a science teacher at Philadelphia's North Catholic High School for Boys, she gets the students involved by using food.

"Boys love to eat," Scott said. "Anytime I can incorporate food in any of our labs, that is what I do. There was one lab where we brewed root beer."

"I keep all kinds of snacks in a drawer, and the kids know that if they forget their lunch or do not have money for lunch that Ms. Scott has got them covered," said the Oxford Circle resident.

Annette O'Connor, Scott's former professor and Chair of La Salle's Biology Department, nominated her for the award. O'Connor and Scott are currently colleagues at La Salle, where Scott is an adjunct professor teaching a Biology lab course in the evening specifically for Biology majors, and a lecture for non-Biology majors.

"She was always interested and curious and particularly good at labs," O'Connor said. "She was also generous with her time and helped other students. I cannot stress enough her commitment to her students. She wants them to learn and she uses creative ways to attract their attention and get them involved in doing science rather than just observing," she added.

"Mary has dedicated her life to science education and to young people and that is what makes her a great teacher," O'Connor said.

1989 | Maj. Christopher Roth (B.A.) of Arlington, Va., is a Major in the U.S. Army. Did You Know...

- Communication is the largest undergraduate major at La Salle University.
- Three Communication alumni from the Class of 2002 landed on-air positions at news stations shortly after graduation. They are: Grant Lodes, '02 (WVIR-TV NBC 29 News in Charlottesville, Va.); Amanda Burge, '02 (KDUH News in Scotts Bluff, Neb.); and Elizabeth Moors, '02 (KAUZ News in Wichita Falls, Texas).
- La Salle's Graduate Program in Professional Communication, entering its ninth year this fall, awarded its 100th Master's degree this past summer.
- In October 2002, La Salle began a Master's degree program in Professional Communication and Public Relations in Prague—the first of its kind in the Czech Republic—in partnership with the University of New York, Prague.
- La Salle University seniors Mike Mallick and Mark Esposito (both Communication majors) interned as production assistants on the set of the upcoming Kevin Smith film, "Jersey Girl," starring Ben Affleck and Jennifer Lopez. Megan Fenerty, a 1991 graduate of La Salle's Communication program, served as the film's production coordinator.
- Over the past 25 years, 20 Communication alumni have earned law degrees and 10 have earned doctorates from institutions such as: Duke, Georgia, Houston, Iowa, NYU, Ohio State, Penn State, South Florida, and Syracuse. One won a Fulbright Scholarship to the University of Auckland (NZ).
- This year, Communication majors have been integral in the leadership of several student organizations ranging from the Jazz Band, to the Students' Government Association and the Collegian. In total, they make up 17 presidents, 11 vice presidents, and 14 treasurers.

EDUCATION IS TAKING OFF

Christian Brothers Abroad: Men "of the World"

Two months before his brutal murder in Huehuetenango, Guatemala, 38-year-old Brother James Miller, F.S.C., sent a poignant Christmas letter to friends and relatives. Having recovered from surgery in the fall of 1981, he was planning his return to a country he describes as "reaching appalling proportions of murders, tortures, kidnapping, and threats." Authorities are persecuting the Church, he wrote, because it has opted for the poor and oppressed. Numerous priests, religious, and lay catechists had lost their lives. Friends and relatives, he said, were urging him to stay in the United States. Nevertheless, convinced that "God continues to call me to Guatemala," Br. James returned.

Six weeks later, hired assassins killed him in cold blood. The message to the Brothers was clear: back off from educating the indigenous population, the majority but oppressed population of Guatemala. Yes, the message was clear—but it went unheeded.

People today ask why United States Brothers remain at Bethlehem University living in uncertainty, stress, and danger as they educate young Palestinians who have never known anything but "occupation." Others wonder about the 80-year-old Brother who has worked for years with adult drug addicts in Pakistan, a country where Christians are often the poorest of the poor and discriminated against for their religious beliefs.

Not all Brothers serving overseas live in such dramatic situations. But they do exercise their ministry among peoples of other nations, cultures, ethnic heritages, and often languages. Their standard of living is strikingly different from that which could be theirs in the United States. In recent years, U.S. Brothers have served in the Philippines, India, Pakistan, Thailand, Vietnam, Indonesia, Eritrea, Ethiopia, Kenya, Nigeria, South Africa, Cuba, Guatemala, Honduras, Nicaragua, Mexico, Bolivia, Palestine, and Poland—and that list is probably not complete.

These Brothers have responded to what they have experienced as God's call. They don't claim to be better than Brothers who have heard a different call. Rather, they are convinced that this extraordinary service is right for them. A number of Brothers have spent nearly all their apostolic years abroad; others have served for shorter periods.

Many times people have asked me why Brothers go overseas when there are so many needs in the United States. It is true there are many needs. Nevertheless, it is also true that what we offer in the United States is often an alternative, one that we believe is superior to what others are offering. When we open a school in economically poor regions of the world, however, we are not proposing an alternative! On the contrary, we are providing an educational opportunity that would not exist otherwise.

Saint John Baptist de La Salle was concerned primarily with reaching young people he described as "poor, abandoned, and far from salvation," young people lacking opportunities for education. That concern has motivated Brothers in the past, and continues to motivate them today.

Today, Christian Brothers serve in 80 countries. How did they reach these countries? The answer is obvious. Brothers experienced the call to serve in a foreign land. They arrived, promoted local vocations, and in many areas, eventually made themselves redundant. Such is the history of the Brothers in the United States. We began in Baltimore with the help of French and Canadian Brothers. Without that help, La Salle University would not exist today.

Today, six United States Americans serve at our international headquarters in Rome. I had the privilege of living this special overseas ministry for 24 years—10 as Vicar General, 14 as Superior General. I spent five to six months a year in visits to Lasallian students and teachers throughout the world. That international experience changed me for life. I now "think" internationally. Quite spontaneously, I "see, judge, and act" from a global perspective. I realize that I am "different." But I believe that this "difference" is a richness that I wish everyone had.

That belief leads me to urge students and teachers to take advantage of educational and service opportunities abroad. In a world growing smaller but unfortunately more divided by the day, Lasallian education should help young people become men and women "of the world."

Brother John C. Johnston, F.S.C., is the Regional Director of Education for the U.S./Toronto Region of the De La Salle Christian Brothers. Previously, he served as Vicar General (1976-86) and Superior General (1986-2000) at the Brothers International Headquarters in Rome. He is a member of La Salle University's Board of Trustees.

Br. John is greeted by middle school students during a trip to Chile in the mid-80s.

La Salle University's INTERNATIONAL EDUCATION TAKING OFF

By Kimberly Dugan

In the coming years, having a global education will not be an option—it will be a necessity.

La Salle University has recognized this imperative and is expanding Travel Study and Study Abroad programs to address two goals: ensuring that students maintain a competitive edge and develop an international perspective; and reinforcing the Lasallian mission to help students liberate themselves from narrow interests, prejudices, and perspectives.

"Employers are beginning to look at candidates' international experiences more than their internship experiences," said Brandyn Muller, M.A. '03, an International Education Coordinator at La Salle. "Travel Study and Study Abroad offer academic growth, but also a unique personal growth. Examining another culture first-hand allows students to see the differences and similarities between another culture and their own, and it challenges them to examine their own way of life more critically."

Travel Study is a course-oriented travel opportunity that prepares students for a journey to an international location. During a semester, students learn about their destination's culture, history, and religion, and then get to experience them up-close.

Robert Vogel, Ed.D., Professor of Education, has taught Travel Study courses for the past four years. Some of his destinations have included Poland, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Austria, and most recently, Spain.

"I became involved in teaching Travel Study because I realized that students had limited—if any—international travel experience and therefore, there is a gap in truly understanding and being tolerant of different cultures. Developing cultural understanding is critical to a liberal arts education," Vogel said.

"The core concept is understanding others," he continued. "We do some traditional sight-seeing when we travel, but there is a much greater emphasis on meeting people, having conversations, and immersing yourself into their culture. We schedule meetings with political and religious leaders, and we spend time visiting schools and talking to students as young as elementary school up to college-age.

"It is about human contact because the people are the heartbeat of a country's culture," Vogel said. "This is what leads to understanding others."

Vogel's most recent trip to Barcelona, Spain was arranged rather quickly to make up for a planned trip to Turkey, which was cancelled due to the current political situation.

"It's ironic: We are trying to encourage these travel courses because of the current world conflicts, but we are being forced to cancel trips for the same reason," he said.

In addition to Travel Study, the Study Abroad Program offers students the chance to live and go to school in a foreign country for an entire semester. La Salle began its first cooperative agreement with two universities, one in Rome and the other in Galway, in the fall of 2002. In the past, bers. Classes are taught in a more European style with larger lecture halls. Each year, almost 1,000 international students from 40 different countries attend NUI, giving La Salle students exposure to a wide variety of cultures.

"After four months abroad, the students return more mature and more self-confident," said Julie Valenti, Assistant Dean for the School of Arts and Sciences and Study Abroad Advisor. "The experience enhances their life skills, and most say it is a life-changing experience. They learn what it means to be American by reflecting on their culture through the eyes of another."

Every student at La Salle regardless of major has the chance to explore Travel Study and Study Abroad opportunities, but there are some majors that have international travel prospects unique to their own program.

Nursing students have the chance to participate in the International Association for Human Caring Conference held every year in both international and domestic locations. Two years ago, La Salle students journeyed to Scotland to be a part of the event.

"Nurses from all over the world attend this conference," said Zane Wolf, R.N., Dean of the School of Nursing. "Nurses from Russia, Japan, Indonesia, Scandinavia—the list goes on. And we are able to discuss our research and approaches to the science of human caring."

Graduate students in the M.B.A. program have the chance to be a part of the Euro-Seminar, which La Salle participates in every year. In Spring 2003, students traveled to Germany, Italy, and Switzerland to directly view international business practices.

"In today's economy, it is necessary to understand global business," said Joseph Ugras, Ph.D., students would have to sign up for studying in those locations through programs at other local universities. Now, they remain La Salle students while attending.

American University in Rome (AUR) is similar to La Salle's setting. It is a small, private institution, where faculty and students have a great deal of interaction. About half of the students who attend are American and the other half are international; La Salle's students are able to adjust to their surroundings with fellow Americans, while interacting with students from all parts of the world.

National University of Ireland, Galway (NUI) is much larger than La Salle with more than 11,000 students and 1,000 staff mem-

Associate Dean of the School of Business. "These trips help students gain perspective on how international business operates and how they can become involved."

La Salle already has several Travel Study courses planned for the 2003-04 academic year. Turkey and Greece are only two of the places that students will be able to visit. Students are also in the process of preparing to study abroad at both AUR and NIU for the Fall 2003 semester. In addition, the Study Abroad Program is looking to expand its global partnerships with other universities so that students will be able to study abroad through La Salle in a variety of other countries.

Some students may feel intimidated to go to another country, but Muller urges students to challenge themselves to see the world.

"This type of international travel is unique to your college years, and it is an incredible life and educational lesson. Anyone who has even the slightest interest in Travel Study or Study Abroad should look into it because it opens your eyes to other worlds," Muller said. ■

Bringing the World to La Salle

By Caitlin Murray

For the first time in generations, many Americans are paying close attention to our relationship with the rest of the world.

Realizing that education is the basis for global understanding, La Salle administrators have taken steps to make international recruitment a priority.

"International education is very important and will become an even more important part of education," said Taya Abrahamian, M.B.A. '93, an International Education Coordinator in La Salle's Multicultural and International Center. "We live in a global community. We're expanding and learning more about other cultures and perspectives. Not only do the students who come here to study learn new things, they're also adding value to our campus. We're learning from each other and that's the most important thing."

As of this past spring semester, a total of 107 international students—44 undergraduate and 63 graduate—were enrolled at the University. They're from 33 different countries across the globe—Argentina, Bosnia, China, India, Japan, Korea, Poland, Turkey, and Yugoslavia, just to name a few.

Of the 63 international graduate students, 58 of them are in La Salle's new Full-Time M.B.A. Program, which was launched last year. Another factor that contributes to international population growth is the recently-established presence of an international undergraduate recruiter.

"Before then, a prospective student would call from Ghana, for instance, and whoever answered the phone in Admission would ask who was available to help him or her," said Erick Hyde, '00, Coordinator of International

Admission and Assistant Dean of Admission. "There just weren't as many interested international students as there are now, and no one on staff was designated to recruit them."

Hyde said the Admission Office has seen a steady rise in the number of applications from international students over the years. In 1998, for example, 45 international students applied for undergraduate admission to La Salle. Close to 120 applied this year.

This could be attributed in part to the overseas trips Hyde and the international recruiter who preceded him have made. Last September, Hyde journeyed to Asia for 15 days, visiting schools in South Korea, China, Hong Kong, the Philippines, Thailand, and Singapore as part of a traveling college fair. He was with representatives from Purdue, Pepperdine, Bucknell, and the University of Miami, among others.

"It was pretty impressive to see La Salle being put on the same level as some of the heavy hitters," said Hyde.

Joseph Ugras, Ph.D., Associate Dean of the School of Business, and Elizabeth Scofield, Director of International Programs, recruit international graduate students at various fairs with other highly regarded M.B.A. programs.

Ugras said La Salle's AACSB International accreditation and its

Philadelphia location are very attractive to his recruits. "Carrying the La Salle name has also helped us during the first year of this new program," he said. "Many prospective students are familiar with La Salle's dedication to educating the individual because of the established Christian Brother institutions in many of the countries where we recruit."

Hyde said small class sizes, personal attention, and accessibility to a big city are very appealing to his recruits.

Cecile Van Oppen, a native of the Netherlands, applied to several schools in the United States, including Harvard and Boston University. She chose La Salle for its size and friendly atmosphere.

"I enjoy the class sizes because every student gets personal attention, which is important to me, coming from a high school class of 11 students. I enjoy the fact that I can meet new people every year, but that I also know people wherever I go on campus," said Van Oppen, a political science/economics and international studies double major who is about to enter her senior year. She hopes to continue her studies in England after graduation and wants to work for a non-governmental organization or the United Nations.

"When international students come here, they don't only learn about the culture of the United States, they take that knowledge back to their countries after graduation," Abrahamian said. "Most of them go on to hold important positions in their countries. Suppose one of them becomes a prime minister or someone prominent in government, for example. They can take the positive things they have learned about our government and culture to educate their people. That is what I mean when I talk about global education or a global community. We're learning from each other—about different cultures, values, and perspectives."

After the recruitment process is over and international students arrive on campus, the University still works to help them in all aspects of their education. An International Education Management Team was recently assembled to oversee issues related to international education that cross traditional department lines. Charged by Provost Richard Nigro, Ph.D., and Vice President for Enrollment Services Raymond Ricci, the team is made up of representatives from various academic and administrative departments on campus. Members meet regularly to discuss all dimensions of international education, including recruitment, student services, Study Abroad and Travel Study, and community service projects.

"It's always difficult to go to a strange country away from your family and friends. Just knowing that a drastic change is ahead of you can be exciting and scary at the same time. That's why we try so hard to make it easier for them, to assure them that we are here to help," said Abrahamian, a member of the team. "And when we help students and see how appreciative they are, that just makes my day." ■

Three Amigas

By Raysa Francis, '03

Even during their worst times, and there were many, these three friends—Miosotis Adorno, Maria Lozada, and Zahira Soto—stuck together to overcome adversity, and, ultimately, graduate from La Salle this May with bachelor's degrees in social work.

The three women are originally from Puerto Rico and met while working at Congreso de Latinos Unidos (a Latino social service agency). Together, they attended the evening program at La Salle. As full-time social workers, they all say their goal in life is to help others and give hope to those in need.

They started their educational journey through BUSCA, an associate degree program at La Salle where Latino students can learn in their first language—Spanish—while mastering English.

Soto began the program as a 37-year-old single mother of two. When her son was diagnosed with leukemia last year, she wasn't sure if she could continue.

"I was overwhelmed, furious, and depressed. I was going to drop out of school because I just could not handle the pressure," she said. "But Maria and Miosotis stayed by my side, and I felt that I could not disappoint them, so I stayed."

Today, Soto works with people who have contracted HIV as an early interventions counselor for Congreso.

Lozada left a violent husband behind to bring her children to the U.S. Now a case manager at Congreso, she assists people with HIV. "I am devoted to empower these people by getting them food, housing, insurance, and counseling to make them understand that they can have a normal life with their medical condition," she said.

The third member of this trio, Adorno, lost her father when she first started out at La Salle. She was so depressed that she nearly dropped out of school, but her two friends convinced her to stick it out. "They told me that's what my father would have wanted." She knew they were right. She will now use her degree to help children with problems at school and at home.

Raysa Francis, '03, earned a Master of Arts in Professional Communication from La Salle in May. She is a native of the Dominican Republic. ■

Out of the Comfort Zone

By Melissa Mazur, '03

Melissa Mazur, '03, wrote the following article after returning from a Travel Study class to Spain this spring.

Over this year's spring break, a La Salle Travel Study class gave new meaning to being Explorers.

Sixteen students went to Madrid, Spain, to play the role of educational psychologists and anthropologists: making unbiased observations of the culture and education to help them answer the question, "Do schools reflect their culture, or do they shape it?"

Before leaving, the students got some basics in how to be good social scientists, receiving instruction in learning and cultural theories, and reading about educational systems that could guide their observations and conclusions.

Also, they took part in exercises that could help them observe in a more unbiased manner.

"I have noticed that I now pay attention to more things," said Lindsay DeMuth, '04. "I seem to better perceive things that I do, and things that others do, and the effects they have on our culture."

This trip was a Travel Study course called, The Cultural Context of Learning: Spain. It was led by Professor of Education Preston Feden, Ed.D., and co-taught by Frank Mosca, Ph.D., also of the Education Department.

"Much of what we learn is not learned in school," Feden said. "Virtually everything we learn is influenced by the context in which it is learned. The largest social context is the culture in which we live."

In addition, the students tried to get a holistic idea of the Spanish culture by examining it from different viewpoints. They looked at culture from a traditional view by attending a bullfight and flamenco show; an artistic view by examining the work of painters such as Goya, Velasquez, and Picasso in The Prado and the Reina Sofia Museums; and a historical view by touring places such as the Palacio Real, El Escorial, and Francisco Franco's The Valley of the Fallen.

In Madrid, the class visited Nuestra Señora de Las Maravillas School, founded and run by the Christian Brothers. They not only observed classes in which English was being taught by Las Maravillas teachers, but they also taught lessons and led discussions on preconceived notions of America and Spain. After explaining their views on America, the La Salle group and the Spanish students had a lively discussion.

There was daily interaction between the La Salle students and their teachers, and seminars were held every evening. These sessions, students said, enabled them to develop problem-solving, observational, and analytical skills. The sessions helped them interpret what they were experiencing while in Madrid, in light of the course concepts.

Feden's approach for the course came from his background in special education. From his research, he realized that children with disabilities are not so dissimilar to non-disabled children when it comes to learning. The techniques used in teaching one group could be used with the other. Feden found that the same idea could be applied across cultures.

"One of my main purposes in this course was to get students out of their comfort zones, to meet other people seemingly different from them, so that they could realize the commonalities we all share as human beings, while simultaneously understanding, appreciating, and even valuing the differences that exist among various cultures," Feden said.

Kelly Strobel, '05, found this to be true. "By being able to have the opportunity to experience this, I learned so much more about my own culture and why we do the things we do," she said. "It is practically impossible to analyze and experience a different culture without being forced to then analyze one's own."

This course was one of the first offerings of the newly created minor in Leadership and Global Understanding. Courses in this minor include a service-learning element, so students prepared projects to demonstrate what they learned to a larger community. One group produced a documentary about the trip that has aired on La Salle's television station, Channel 56. Another developed a temporary Web site that eventually will be made permanent on Dr. Feden's Web page. ■

A Little New, A Little Old as La Salle Reaches Out to the Czech Republic

By Michael Smith, Ph.D.

As any experienced teacher will tell you, the first day of every semester is a white-knuckled, stomach-churning, nerve-wracking occasion. The newness of each term invokes these fears; new students bring a new dynamic to even the most familiar courses. Each semester brings its own new challenges.

When I stepped off the plane in Prague to teach the first class offered in the Master's in Professional Communication and Public Relations Program, a new culture and a new program compounded the "newness queasiness quotient." Discussions with people at La Salle's partner institution, the University of New York-Prague, led me to expect students who were quiet and taciturn, yet eager to learn from American instructors.

I was comforted as I entered the classroom for the first evening's session. The classroom resembled those at La Salle's Bucks County Center: long tables and chairs, white board, Power Point. As the first group of students sauntered into the classroom, they looked like my U.S. graduate students: dressed in casual attire; nervous, new student faces; tired looking eyes from working all day before coming to class.

I made other pleasant discoveries as class progressed. The world experience of this group was deep and varied. One student had studied and worked in England for several years. She now is a communication manager for a major Czech telecommunication firm. Her perspective on Czech organizations and business communication was invaluable during class discussions. Another student is a radio reporter who currently works for Radio Free Europe. He lived in his native Kazakhstan through the dissolution of the Soviet Union and was covering the struggles that country is still experiencing. Another student had interned for one of the better-known public relations agencies in Eastern Europe. The agency is noted not only for the quality of its practice, but also for the fact that it is headed by a well-known scholar of public relations, whose work had been published widely in the U.S. and Europe.

These students were keen observers of the transformations that Europe is experiencing, and were able to help me understand them better. They helped me understand the local media markets, told me about the best places to eat, and provided me with informal Czech lessons. Dobry den means "good day," for example. They were chatty, witty, and vibrant.

Despite all these new experiences, some things were familiar. The students struggle with balancing work, family, and graduate courses. They complained about the cost of education. And they wondered if they could make it as graduate students.

Happily, like the best Lasallian experiences, my first course in Prague proved to be a fortunate meeting of teacher and students, new and old, with both learning from each other. I look forward to my next trip, when I can expand my Czech vocabulary, learn more about the Czech P.R. scene, and deepen the well that feeds my teaching experience.

Michael Smith, Ph.D., is the Director of La Salle's new Graduate Program in Professional Communication and Public Relations in Prague. 1

The Call of Duty

Even in a time of war, education still goes on.

On June 6, an officer from McGuire Air Force Base, N.J., came to campus to present La Salle's School of Nursing with a certificate of appreciation on behalf of Jody Austin, '04, a part-time L.P.N. to B.S.N. student who is stationed in the Middle East. By connecting with her superior officers, La Salle professors have enabled Austin to take exams and complete other required coursework for the two classes she was enrolled in this past semester.

Many other La Salle students and alumni are serving our country in all branches of the military. The following are the names of our student nurses who are currently stationed in the Middle East: Bertha Jackson, M.S.N., '05; Tynetta Heath, B.S.N., '04; and Derrick Dash, B.S.N., '04.

Expanding the Opportunities

By Jon Caroulis

As an African-American living in the United States, Joanna McClinton, '03, thought she knew what it meant to live as a minority. That is, until she went to Eastern Europe three years ago.

"I thought it was very tough being a minority in America, but it was another thing to go to Poland and the Czech Republic, because our whole (Travel Study) class became a minority," McClinton said. "No one spoke Polish or Czech, and it was an eye-opening experience."

This is the type of reaction that Robert Vogel, Ed.D., Marjorie Allen, Ph.D., and Louise Giugliano hope happens more often to La Salle students. The three have designed and will administer La Salle's new minor in Leadership and Global Understanding.

During a Travel Study class to Europe three years ago, Vogel, a professor of Education, realized La Salle needed to expand its international educational opportunities. He wanted to provide unique and challenging experiences that exposed students to cultures other than their own.

"I was doing my first Travel Study course in Spain with 40 students, and what really struck me was the naïveté of the students towards the world around them," Vogel said.

"They just didn't understand different cultures, different lands, different people—they have never traveled. It really struck me that teaching our students about the world and understanding others is something that has to become very important in what we do at La Salle."

Allen, a professor of English, said, "There are many universities and colleges offering programs on preparing students to become involved citizens within their community, but we felt they did not have enough emphasis on students taking charge of their own learning in which they apply knowledge and solve problems through participation in important experiences."

Students earning a minor in Leadership and Global Understanding will combine coursework, foreign study/travel programs, and participation in both off-campus community service organizations and in leadership positions with on-campus programs that are designed to foster global and cultural understanding.

The minor is designed to be experiential in nature, and each of the six required courses has a service-learning component requiring students to participate in volunteer service with a mentor in the community. "Our hope is to develop the next generation of 'leaders' who will take a leadership role in their community," Vogel said.

In addition, students must prepare a portfolio to document the work they have done. Students will be encouraged to integrate their service experience with previous Travel Study courses. The portfolio is to be a product of a student's personal experience and growth, not merely a collection of graded work already returned, said Vogel and Allen. It must be an active reflection upon that work.

McClinton, a political science major who will attend law school, said visiting the Nazi concentration camp at Auschwitz left an indelible mark on her, one that she has reflected on.

"It was very, very horrifying, just to see the remnants," she said. "Walking around there made me aware of the type of hate that can exist in the world. And it was less than 70 years ago when all that unfolded. It also made me more determined to be tolerant in my lifestyle."

Giugliano, Associate Director of University Ministry and Service, will be overseeing the placement of students in service-learning and mentoring situations. She said the timing for the minor could not be more appropriate.

"Do we need more evidence than currently exists that we are living at a time when students need to be prepared to take on the challenge of global leadership?" she asked. "This minor will prepare them to think and act in expanding concentric circles of community from local-urban to global. We owe it to them to focus on the issues that are ripe for these times," she said.

Vogel, Allen, and Giugliano also said the minor presented the opportunity to form a first-ever academic partnership with the Division of Student Affairs at La Salle (of which University Ministry and Service is a component). "We envisioned this program as being university-wide," Allen said. ■

International Teachers: Keeping Things in Perspective

By Jon Caroulis

Learning in a foreign country can be tough enough, but teaching in one can have its pitfalls. Of course, it has its advantages, too—for the teacher and the student.

La Salle University is lucky to have a number of foreign-born faculty and administrators whose very presence constantly reminds students that theirs isn't the only perspective that matters.

"When I teach the gross domestic product, I ask my students that if they were to rank the countries of the world according to economic well being, what are the factors you look at," said Richard Mshomba, Ph.D., '85, a La Salle professor of economics originally from Tanzania. "They will say roads, technology, education systems, health systems, inflation, and so forth, but most of the time they never mention water or electricity until I say that. And it's, 'Oh, okay.' I go on to explain that the vast majority of people in the world do not have access to clean water, access to electricity. That brings a very real world perspective."

When Mshomba returns to Tanzania, he makes videos of life there and shows them to his classes. He also discusses what foreign newspapers report about America. From that point, he'll discuss how economic issues, such as multi-lateral trade negotiations, are affected by foreign perceptions of the U.S.

"Most of the students appreciate my bringing a foreign perspective to class, and some students have commented on that on evaluations. They appreciate that perspective," Mshomba said.

When Joshua Buch, Ph.D., a professor of finance, has a class with foreign-born students in it, he starts the course with this story:

As a graduate business student, he was assigned to write a paper on an interdisciplinary approach to marketing.

"I had no idea what that meant," recalled Buch, who had never been out of Israel before coming to Philadelphia for graduate school. "I only thought of 'discipline' as meaning corporal punishment. I thought it meant they were going to beat up people to buy their stuff." Later, he went to a librarian and asked him to find a sentence using the word "interdisciplinary."

Joshua Buch, Ph.D.

Vivienne Angeles, Ph.D.

"I tell foreign students to relax," Buch said.

Vivienne Angeles, Ph.D., received a scholarship to do graduate work at Kansas State University after she graduated from the University of the Philippines. When she arrived, she "saw that the place was just like the way I imagined it from 'The Wizard of Oz,'" she said.

About being a foreign-born instructor teaching American students, Angeles said, "One of the first things they (U.S. students) notice is that I am different and have an accent. I encourage them to raise their hands and ask me to repeat what I said if necessary," she said. "I also noticed that students are not usually familiar with my part of the world, so I try to include articles on Islam in Southeast Asia and devote some time to geography in my courses on Islam."

As for the differences between foreign and American students, Angeles said, "There are students in both societies (the Philippines and U.S.) who are achievement-oriented. The difference is that in the Philippino context, students, at least during my time, saw themselves as sharing their achievements or failures with the family." she said. "Another reason is that parents have the sole financial responsibility for their children's education. Individualism, which is valued in this country, is not viewed positively in the Philippines." ■

Diplomats in the Making

By Mark E. Dixon

La Salle University doesn't have a school of foreign relations but is, nevertheless, quietly turning out some of the nation's future diplomats.

For this, credit La Salle's Diplomat-in-Residence Program (D.R.P.). Founded in 1993 to bring foreign diplomats on campus as speakers, it has also helped several students identify future careers.

Svitlana Gorbova, '03, for instance, is planning a career with the U.S. State Department. A political science major, Gorbova has lived in the United States only since 1999, when she moved here from Ukraine with her parents. During the summer of 2002, she worked as an intern in the Washington Embassy of the Republic of Cyprus and has since been accepted at the Georgetown University School of Foreign Service.

"Such internships are very rare," said Professor of Philosophy Cornelia Tsakiridou, Ph.D., Director of the Diplomat-in-Residence Program. "Most embassies don't give them at all or, if they do, they give them to their own citizens." Usually, the approval of the ambassador is required.

Working to Gorbova's benefit, however, was La Salle's long relationship with the Cypriot Embassy in Washington. D.R.P. launched with an appearance by the Cypriot Ambassador in the spring of 1993. More than 100 foreign diplomats have visited since, and many of those relationships have endured.

"Big universities use their prestige to draw speakers and get internships," Tsakiridou said. "With us, it's mostly personal connections with people who visited the University." Similarly, Tsakiridou's dual (Greek and U.S.) citizenship gives her an advantage in dealing with the Greek Embassy, as does her doctorate from Georgetown University when dealing with that school.

Financial support from the Provost's Office is also critical in allowing students to take summer internships in expensive Washington, D.C., she said.

Other La Salle students who have benefited from such contacts include Ludwika Chrzastowska, '04, who is currently interning at the press office of the Greek Embassy in Washington, D.C., and Christopher Schwartz, '04, a summer intern at the Center for Contemporary Studies at Georgetown University. (For security reasons, internship opportunities are usually confined to embassy press offices.)

Initially, Tsakiridou's intention was simply to broaden La Salle students' horizons a bit. Born in Greece, she was educated at Anatolia College at Thessaloniki, where virtually everyone spoke at least two languages. Tsakiridou speaks Greek, English, and French.

"Only 10-12 million people in the world speak Greek, so it's virtually a requirement to speak at least one other language," she said. In that very international environment, Tsakiridou met students from throughout the Mediterranean, as well as American teachers who had served in the Peace Corps. So, when she later spent a year as a foreign exchange student with a California family, the transition to a monolingual culture with relatively little contact with foreigners was startling.

"What it impressed on me is how much foreign experience changes people," Tsakiridou said. "When people meet people from other places and discover that they are not like them, that discovery makes them people of more than one world."

When she arrived at La Salle in the early 1990s and found it similarly isolated, Tsakiridou decided to create a tool to crack through that shell. The Diplomat-in-Residence Program became that tool.

In retrospect, many of Tsakiridou's programs seem to have been created for this moment in history. A 1995 program coinciding with the 50th anniversary of the United Nations looked at the organization's successes, failures, and future prospects. In 1997, ambassadors of Morocco, Egypt, Indonesia, and Sudan gathered with a variety of experts to discuss "Islam and the West." In 1999, experts discussed the rights of Muslim women, the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, American foreign policy, and prospects for regional stability.

In 2000, the theme was "Threats to International Security." That program featured a panel discussion on terrorist groups by representatives of the Center for Counter Terrorism Studies, the FBI, Department of State, U.S. Special Operations Command, and others.

"Back then, not many people were interested in the subject,"

The Venerable Palden Gyatso

Tsakiridou said. "Now, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to get those people."

Why do they come? Mostly, she said, foreign ambassadors consider these sorts of appearances to be good public relations. Representatives of smaller countries are somewhat easier to attract than those of major powers. But since the major powers tend to be great interest in small countries, those are often the people who need to be heard.

"There's certainly more motivation among ambassadors whose countries need to improve their U.S. image," Tsakiridou said. "We've invited the Saudis for the past 10 years and they never even bothered to respond. In 2002, they came."

Tsakiridou measures D.R.P.'s success in two ways. First, there's the attendance—the number of students who turn out for programs and lectures. Wednesday evening lectures tend to be best attended, with more than 300 people filling such venues as the Dan Rodden Theatre or the Union Building Ballroom.

A second measure is students such as Gorbova who develop and pursue an interest. Active in D.R.P. throughout her college years, Gorbova served as a moderator on an April 2003 panel on Greek-Turkish relations by the Greek and Turkish ambassadors and a representative of the U.S. State Department.

This followed Gorbova's experience the previous summer at the Cypriot Embassy, where she edited the embassy's newsletter, catalogued English publications, and assisted with official visits of dignitaries. She also did a research project on Cyprus' pending membership in the European Union.

Before coming to the United States, Gorbova lived in Great Britain, where she learned English, and Germany, where she also picked up the local language. Those European experiences proved a useful contrast, she said, with the United States, whose culture is very different.

"Europeans know how to enjoy life," she said. "Americans live to work."

Asked which is best, Gorbova paused, then laughed.

"It's good to combine both," she concluded, diplomatically. ■

More Than Business Partners

Joseph Ugras, Ph.D., Associate Dean of La Salle's School of Business (right), officiated the engagement ceremony of Cidam Ersoz, '01 (left), and Cagatay Gencal, '01 (center), at the Marriott Hotel in Conshohocken, Pa., on December 29, 2002. Ersoz and Gencal, both natives of Turkey, met in La Salle's M.B.A. Program and graduated with double majors in Management Information Systems and Finance in 2001. After dating for close to three years, the couple was married on January 2, 2003, at the Turkish Embassy in New York, N.Y. They currently reside in Philadelphia.

Thomas Lynch, '03, has led a full and busy life: He saw action at Iwo Jima as a Marine radioman. He once studied for the priesthood. He set up Thanksgiving Day dinners for the needy. His employer asked him to continue working for the company's community relations department, even after retirement. He raised three daughters.

The Degree of a Lifetime

By Jon Caroulis

Despite all of Lynch's accomplishments, he was still troubled by the fact that he never accumulated enough credits to earn a college degree. After attending several semesters at La Salle nearly 60 years ago, Lynch was transferred by his employer and was never able to compile his total credits onto one transcript and complete his education.

But thanks to some dogged detective work by his eldest daughter and a La Salle counselor, the 81-year-old finally received an associate's degree at La Salle's Commencement ceremony on May 11.

After deciding that the priesthood was not the right path for him, Lynch enlisted in the Marines in 1943. After returning to the U.S., he got a job with Eastern Airlines working at the city's airport, located in South Philadelphia, from 11 p.m. to 7 a.m. He started taking classes at La Salle, but it wasn't easy with his schedule.

"After work, I'd get on the subway at Snyder Avenue and sleep until the train got to the Olney station, which was the last stop on the line," Lynch said. In 1948, however, Eastern transferred him to Nashville, Tenn.

Lynch returned to the Philadelphia area and worked for McNeil Laboratories, a pharmaceutical firm that was later purchased by Johnson & Johnson. He and his wife had three daughters, all of whom graduated from college and earned graduate degrees, too. But Lynch had told his children that not completing his college education was his biggest regret.

Last year, Kathy Ciarlante, Lynch's eldest daughter, wondered if her father had enough credits from La Salle and his seminary studies to qualify for a degree. The seminary Lynch attended had closed, and its records were kept at Notre Dame University. Ciarlante went there and obtained her father's transcripts, which she presented to Jim Rook, M.B.A. '99, Associate Director of La Salle's Continuing Studies Office.

Rook thought Lynch might be eligible for an associate's degree, but it appeared he needed courses in religion and philosophy to meet the associate degree's requirements. The seminary transcript showed Lynch had taken courses in Greek and Latin, but Rook thought they were not language courses. The Greek class was on St. Paul's Letters, so Rook realized it was a religion course. But he couldn't decipher the content of the Latin course, and asked Marc Moreau, Ph.D., Chair of La Salle's Philosophy Department, for help. After examining the transcript, Moreau told Rook the Latin course dealt with Cicero's ruminations on friendship and old age—it was a philosophy course, meaning Lynch was eligible for the degree. On May 11, he received his diploma with his children, Ciarlante, Rosemary Lynch, and Jody Saltzman, in attendance.

"It was a great experience, I always will remember it," Lynch said. "It was a real treat."

For Ciarlante, "One of the proudest times, besides my father's walking up onto the stage, was when the graduates were initiated into the Alumni Association—that brought the whole message home. We've already bought him a La Salle sticker for his car, and La Salle t-shirts and sweatshirts from the bookstore. It's been a lot of fun in addition to being a special memory." ■

“Special” Education

By Kimberly Dugan

Colleen Tomaszewski, '03, has discovered that a handicap can sometimes be used to benefit others.

The recent education grad plans to spend her life teaching special needs children—a label that once could have been applied to her.

“I wanted to be a special education teacher since grade school,” Tomaszewski said. “I had a hard time in school, and eventually, I was diagnosed with dyslexia. I knew right then and there that I wanted to help children with special needs.”

For her final semester of student teaching in the spring of 2003, Tomaszewski requested a placement at the Overbrook School for the Blind.

“I didn’t have much experience with the visually impaired and I wanted to gain as much understanding as possible with all aspects of special education,” she said.

“Colleen was the first student in at least six years to go to Overbrook,” said Joyce Hunley, Administrative Director of the Elementary and Special Education Program at La Salle. “I have always been impressed with Colleen’s focus and I was glad to see her initiative about where she wanted to teach so that she could get the most from her experience.”

While at Overbrook, two of Tomaszewski’s students were not only blind, but also autistic.

“It really was an amazing opportunity for me and I learned so much. The students at Overbrook range in age from infants to 21 so I was able to work with a variety of ages and capabilities,” Tomaszewski said. “The sense of community is wonderful. The faculty and students work together to make sure that everyone is doing well.”

Tomaszewski helped her students master simple tasks most people take for granted.

“Some of what I did was take students on field trips to places like supermarkets, so I could teach them how to shop and how to interact with others,” she said.

“I learn as much from my students as they do from me. One of my students started to teach me Braille,” said Tomaszewski. “I learn more from them than they probably realize.”

On top of her devotion to her students, Tomaszewski’s activity list fills six pages and includes tutoring, volunteering in soup kitchens, Big Buddy, neighborhood clean-up, Operation Smile, and Project Appalachia, which took her to Harlan County, Ky., to help build homes for needy families.

Despite her busy schedule, Tomaszewski has nearly a 4.0 grade point average.

“I don’t know how I do it. I must have really good time management skills, but it is just the way I live. This is how I want to spend my time,” she said.

Now that she has graduated, Tomaszewski plans on continuing her education. She will work in a school centered on visual- and hearing-impaired education. She intends to obtain a Master’s in this area and eventually go on to complete her doctoral studies in special education concentrating on autistic support.

“I want to educate myself as much as possible so that I have the skills to help children with disabilities succeed,” Tomaszewski said.

A native of Hyde Park, N.Y., Tomaszewski came to La Salle specifically because of its education program.

“La Salle’s program is unique for a lot of reasons. One is the dual certification in elementary and special education, not just one or the other,” she said. “The program’s field placement is also impressive. Students start earning classroom experience during their first year and that was important to me.” ■

SUMMER GIG EVER

By Kimberly Dugan

John Ogden, '03, doesn't usually take phone calls while at a formal event. But this was a call he knew he couldn't miss.

As he was processing into SS. Peter and Paul Basilica for La Salle's Baccalaureate Mass on May 10, Ogden's cell phone started to ring. "I knew it was the call I had been waiting for, so I hopped out of the procession and took the call," he said.

It was from an NBC 10 staffer informing him that he was one of five finalists in the station's quest to find a new on-air traffic reporter for the summer. A few days later, the fresh communication graduate went on to win the competition, and is now hard at work giving televised advice to local drivers.

Philadelphia's NBC 10 News and Traffic Pulse launched their search in the beginning of May. Auditions were open to adults over the age of 21 who live in the station's viewing area. Close to 1,500 candidates showed up to try out for the contest that became known to all as "The Best Summer Gig Ever."

Ogden stood in line for two-and-a-half hours for his 20-second audition.

"I stood up there in front of the judges and said my name and phone number, and then read 10 seconds of script. That was it," Ogden said.

The judges then scored each applicant on criteria including credibility, confidence, and personality. The candidates with the top 10 scores moved on to the semi-final round.

As Ogden moved to the next round, he and nine other hopefuls auditioned on-air giving a live traffic report. After that, NBC 10 viewers voted for the top five finalists.

Once Ogden received word that he made it to the final round, he prepared to go on television once again so viewers could get a final look at the contestants and cast their votes for the winner, which was announced live on May 21.

"I was ready to be the gracious runner-up, so I had nothing prepared when I was announced the winner," said Ogden, who came out on top as nearly 15,000 viewers cast votes for the final round.

"My first official day of work was on Memorial Day," said Ogden, whose normal routine now includes arriving at the station by 5:00 a.m. His first on-air traffic report is at 5:30 a.m., and he has periodic updates until 8:30 a.m. After that Ogden goes home and returns to the station around 4:00 p.m. for the evening rush.

When asked what a traffic reporter does, Ogden said, "I prepare the actual report. I only have a certain amount of time on-air, so I need to decide what is most important and what information needs to get the air-time. I also generate the graphics and camera shots that are shown."

A former communication major at La Salle, Ogden has always been interested in journalism and broadcasting. As a student, he was active in the University's theatre group, the Masque, the student newspaper, the Collegian, and the University's television station, La Salle 56, which he credits with giving him experience both in front of and behind the camera. He also had an internship with Fox's Good Day Philadelphia, where he eventually earned the position of production assistant.

"My internship was a great experience and it helped me build confidence for a real job," he said. "I also learned a lot by working on La Salle 56 and being involved in the Masque. They helped me to feel comfortable in front of people or when people are watching," he said.

And people are watching. Ogden has become somewhat of a local celebrity.

"Everywhere I go, people recognize me," he said. "My bank is right around the corner from the station and a woman in there said, 'Hey, I just saw you on TV 10 minutes ago.'"

Ogden's summer gig ends in August, but he is hoping the knowledge he is earning will lead to other opportunities.

"My goal is to continue to be an on-air personality, either as an anchor or a reporter, and having this chance to start out in a market as large as Philadelphia really gives me an edge," Ogden said. "I hope that by doing a good job and getting so much experience and exposure, I will be able to develop a promising career in broadcasting." ■

A Commitment to Social Peace

By Jon Caroulis

Somewhere in the Middle East, Army Sgt. Sean Berk received the news about his being awarded La Salle's Joseph F. Flubacher Scholarship for excellence in economics.

"Our telephone and e-mail access is limited and is often restricted for security reasons. By the time I got the news it was about a week after the award dinner," said Berk, a La Salle junior, in an e-mail from the Middle East.

Last year, Berk's reserve unit, the 358th Civil Affairs Brigade, was called up. He's been based in Kuwait since February.

The scholarship is named for Joseph F. Flubacher, '35, a Professor Emeritus who taught economics at La Salle for more than 50 years. In addition to high grades, applicants for the scholarship must demonstrate a commitment to social peace and justice.

In his application, Berk wrote that his mission in Iraq "will be to keep civilians safely out of the line of fire from friend and foe alike, and to advise military commanders of their legal and moral responsibilities to local populations, which include ensuring that civilian casualties are avoided, meeting the basic needs of dislocated civilians, and preserving religious, cultural, and historic landmarks."

After September 11, 2001, Berk decided to pursue a career in diplomacy. He switched majors to economics and international relations, and planned to help countries develop their economies. He says his recent experiences have changed his outlook somewhat.

"To a degree, I'm still interested in the same kind of thing," Berk said in an e-mail, "but the work I am involved in here has given me contact with international organizations, non-government organizations, and private volunteer organizations, so

"I'm at least exploring other options that I could use my degree and civil affairs experience for."

"Since shortly after the start of the war, we have been coordinating the delivery of humanitarian aide, such as medical supplies, humanitarian daily rations, and bottled water. In addition, we track the status of cities and inform civilian organizations of the level of permissiveness in that area, and also provide security for them if it is deemed necessary."

"Our main focus right now is the rebuilding of a stable infrastructure, and enhancement of the social and economic well-being of the people. In this regard, our teams conduct assessments of cities that are in our sector of responsibility, and decide what those cities need in order to get back to normal. Critical functions we are working to restore are, first and foremost, potable water and electricity. We are also working to restore such government services as the educational system, judicial system, police, rail and port facilities, hospitals, and sanitation."

In addition, Berk said the military hopes to hire local citizens to help with the reconstruction, with the goal of "jump-starting the economy."

In a letter of recommendation, La Salle Economics Professor Beth Paulin stated that Berk "wrote a superior paper he researched on economic development in Pakistan. His quantitative research showed that the disproportionate amount of money put into the military, as opposed to infrastructure and education, negatively affected economic growth in Pakistan."

She added, "I can think of no better way for the Economics Department to honor this courageous and loyal young man, whose heart is as big as it gets, than by awarding him the 2003-2004 Flubacher Scholarship." ■

140 Years and Counting

The La Salle University campus community, this March, kicked off a year-long celebration of La Salle's 140th anniversary as a chartered institution. Students, faculty, and staff were treated to delicacies such as chocolate-covered strawberries, flan, hand-carved roast beef and turkey, and made-to-order stir-fry at the annual Charter Day dinner. As is traditional, college administrators and faculty served their colleagues and students during the event. Tech-Invest

La Salle University undergraduate and graduate students will have access to a $50,000 grant from the Ben Franklin Partnership of Southeastern Pennsylvania (BFTP/SEP) to help them develop high-technology, innovation-based, and product-focused businesses. The grant has been provided by Tech-Invest, a new challenge grant program launched by BFTP/SEP and La Salle's Integrated Science, Business and Technology (ISBT) program.

"La Salle is proud to work with our alumni, benefactors, and Ben Franklin to fashion Tech-Invest," said Marsha Timmerman, a professor in the ISBT program. "By combining our respective organizations' entrepreneurial development resources, we create a well-rounded partnership with a solid win/win outcome." The grants are open to any La Salle student regardless of major.

The first recipients of the Tech-Invest challenge grant program will be announced this summer.

This past May, the University graduated its first class of ISBT majors.

La Salle Business Team Wins J&J Competition

A team of La Salle University business students won Johnson & Johnson's national case competition this April, in which contestants had to deal with a real-life problem the firm encountered recently. The team won against nine other colleges from across the country.

The competition was based on a presentation of a marketing/promotion strategy for a "fake" product called "Tolla" made by Johnson & Johnson, which was based on their Tylenol product.

The four students will split a $1,000 prize from Johnson & Johnson, while La Salle's School of Business Administration received an additional $2,500.

Grimes Lecture

Daniel L. Schacter, Professor of Psychology and Chair of the Department of Psychology at Harvard University, delivered the Psychology Department's 24th annual Grimes Lecture on April 24. One of the world's leading experts on memory, Dr. Schacter spoke about his most recent book, The Seven Sins of Memory: How the Mind Forgets and Remembers.

At the event, Diane M. Moyer, Ph.D., '80, received the University's Brother John P. Dondero Award for her devotion to making the science and practice of psychology accessible to others. Dr. Moyer is an associate professor and Chair of the Department of Psychology at Cedar Crest College in Allentown, Pa. A former La Salle field hockey player, she is a member of the University's Hall of Athletes and was a two-time member of the U.S. Olympic Field Hockey Team in 1980 and 1984.

Mission Accomplished

30 Years Later, Women's Sports at La Salle is Thriving

By BOB VETRONE SR.

As the February 5 luncheon was coming to a close in the La Salle Union Ballroom, Mary Ellen Wydan, the University's Senior Woman Administrator, concluded the program thusly: "Sports is an incredible avenue for personal growth in all of us." The meeting was part of La Salle's participation in National Girls and Women in Sports Day, and Wydan's closing words pretty well summed up the feelings of everyone in attendance.

It also highlighted the celebration of La Salle's 30 Years of Women's Sports. Going back to 1972, that history has been filled with girls and women with athletic ability, a pioneer spirit, and determination to bring equality to college athletics participation. You can say mission accomplished. Now, working under the guidance of Title IX, La Salle has 12 sports in which women take part, and, along the way they have brought championships, pride, and equality with them. Three women who were instrumental in bringing those qualities to the La Salle campus were the speakers at the luncheon.

One was Pat (Berry) Sweeney, '72, the daughter of a La Salle grad and the niece of a La Salle professor. She was prominent in starting women's basketball, which was the first team recognized by the Department of Athletics. There were a few other teams, which had "foundational" beginnings before that but came later in the matter of official recognition.

Another was Marianne Dooley, a freshman in 1971. "As sports were added to the La Salle athletic program," Wydan said, "she played them ... field hockey, basketball, softball, tennis, track and field, and swimming."

Dooley was a member of the Athletic Advisory Committee and captain of the 1975 basketball team, and when that season ended, she graduated with a degree in psychology, then worked with children with developmental disabilities. Dooley retired in 2002 as a computer systems programmer for the State of New Jersey Office of Information Technology. She is the field hockey representative in the Explorer Club, the Athletics fundraising group.

In summing up Dooley's contributions, Wydan said, "She was an inspiration to her teammates and a tireless advocate for women's athletics on campus at that time."

Nora Kramer, '77, was one who got so heavily involved in women's sports that she became the first recipient of the Mary O'Connor Award. That award, named after La Salle's first Coordinator of Women's Athletics Activities, went to an individual who exemplified the loyalty, dedication, and service to the La Salle Women's Intercollegiate Program.

Kramer, later an assistant women's basketball coach, spent 10 years doing missionary work among the gangs of Chicago, and working with children internationally in Chile and El Salvador.

She earned a degree in nursing and a Master's in health administration and education and is now nurse manager at Philadelphia's Thomas Jefferson University Hospital. Great women, great athletes, great contributors, and outstanding role models in the realm of

The Man with the Lucky Bow Tie

Coaching Legend Jim Phelan, '51, Says Goodbye to College Basketball

BY TOM EMBERLEY

This past March 1, a legend in college basketball stepped down from his head coaching post at Mount St. Mary's College (Emmitsburg, Md.) after coaching an NCAA record 49 seasons.

Jim Phelan, '51, led The Mount to a 60-56 victory over Central Connecticut State that afternoon, in his 1,354th and final game on the bench. And while he will be remembered mostly for his 830 victories in the coaching ranks, he will be recognized more so for his trademark bow ties. As a tribute to Phelan, many of the nation's coaches wore bow ties in his honor March 1, including Explorers Head Men's Basketball Coach Billy Hahn. Very few people realize, though, that Phelan picked up the habit of wearing a bow tie at 20th and Olney nearly 50 years ago.

"Before his first game (at Mount St. Mary's) in 1954, I was laying out some clothes," said the South Philadelphia native's wife, Dottie. "As I was doing that, I laid out a bow tie for him, because (former La Salle head) Coach (Ken) Loeffler wore them, and his teams did well. Well, we won that game, and kept on winning as Jim kept wearing the bow ties."

Phelan, whose 830 wins trail only North Carolina's Dean Smith (879) and Kentucky's Adolph Rupp (876) on the NCAA's career ledger, played for Loeffler in the late 40s and early 50s, went 22-3 in his first season of coaching, and the bow tie legend had started. The starting point guard on Loeffler's 1951 National Invitation Tournament

(NIT) squad, he garnered Honorable Mention All-America accolades before serving in the Korean War as a member of the U.S. Marine Corps. Phelan returned to the United States in time to serve as La Salle's freshman basketball coach in the 1953-54 campaign. Though not an assistant coach by title, he helped Loeffler coach the Tom Gola-led team to the 1954 NCAA Championship.

Also a member of the NBA's Philadelphia Warriors during the 1953-54 season, Phelan was recommended for the Mount St. Mary's job by Loeffler the following year. His illustrious head coaching career began in the 1954-55 campaign, and Phelan led The Mount to the 1962 College Division (the modern-day equivalent to the NCAA's Division II) National Championship. Before Mount St. Mary's became a Division I institution in 1988-89, Phelan led the school to a quintet of Division II

Final Four appearances. He continued his success at the Division I level, as The Mount made two NCAA appearances and received an NIT bid during Phelan's tenure.

Ironically, Phelan's two daughters, Lynne and Carol, nearly curbed their father's success roughly midway through his coaching career.

"As the girls were becoming teenagers, they were very fashion-conscious and weren't too fond of the bow ties," Dottie Phelan recounted. "So before the (1971-72) season, they asked their father to wear the straight ties instead." Phelan's Mount St. Mary's squad went 6-17 that year, the worst coaching record of his career. Needless to say, he switched back to the trademark bow ties, and the wins kept coming from that point on.

Because of his coaching accomplishments, Phelan was honored April 28 by the Herb Good Basketball Club. He also was a guest speaker at the April 24 La Salle Explorer Club Fund Drive Kick-Off Party. ■

Making Headlines

Tom Curley, '70, former president and publisher of USA Today, has been appointed President and Chief Executive Officer of the world's largest news organization, the Associated Press.

Founded in 1848, the A.P. is a non-profit news cooperative of U.S. newspapers and broadcasters that provides more than 15,000 media outlets worldwide and thousands of commercial customers with news stories, photographs, audio, video, and multimedia on-line products.

Curley was the original news staffer on the project that led to the creation of USA Today, the nation's largest-selling daily newspaper. In 1979, he was assigned to study the feasibility of a national newspaper and later worked in every department of the paper. In 1986, he became the paper's sixth president and in 1991 added the title of publisher.

Curley began his journalism career at age 15 covering high school basketball for his hometown newspaper, the Easton (Pa.) Express. During his days at La Salle, he became editor of the Collegian, and went on to join Gannett's Rochester (N.Y.) Times-Union after graduation.

He is the Vice Chair of La Salle's Board of Trustees.

A Hole in One

The 2003 President's Cup was held on April 21 at Blue Bell Country Club. Over 200 golfers enjoyed a day on the greens, and even more turned out for an evening of fun, which included an auction and drawing of the President's Cup Raffle. This year's event raised $192,000 for financial aid and scholarship resources for students. Reunion '03 a Shining Success

Reunion 2003 on May 16 and 17 may have been a wet one, but alumni spirits weren't dampened by the inclement weather. This year, the 50th anniversary Class of '53 and 25th anniversary Class of '78 were honored at a medal Convocation and their own special dinners. Pictured top left, La Salle President Br. Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., Ph.D., '70, poses with Marge Carroll, widow of James Carroll, '53. Br. Michael presented Mrs. Carroll with a 50th anniversary gold medallion in honor of her late husband. Other reunion classes were treated to an Oktoberfest, tours of the campus and La Salle Art Museum, a family-friendly Aloha Luau, a catered dinner, and a Monte Carlo-themed game of chance/dance party. Thanks to the many alumni who turned out for Reunion and helped make it a huge success. Plans are already underway for another gala celebration next year.

'53 Crew Champions Gather at Annual Dad Vail Regatta

The Dad Vail Regatta, the largest collegiate regatta in the country, was held on May 10 along Kelly Drive. La Salle alumni gathered with current members of the Explorers men's and women's crew teams at La Salle's tent and enjoyed a day of barbecuing and reminiscing with friends. Life After Graduation:

Financial Advice and Money Saving Tips
by John Ricchini, '93, and Terry Arndt

Life After Graduation, L.L.C., 2000
160 pp., $13.95

You worked so hard to get there. You struggled through accounting, biology, and history. You put up with tests, speeches, and debates. You even pulled an all-nighter or two during finals week.

Finally, graduation day has arrived. After all the excitement is over and you get ready to step out on your own, you think to yourself, "How can I afford life after graduation?"

John Ricchini, '93, and partner, Terry Arndt, have published a book to help alleviate the financial worries that often occur post graduation. Life After Graduation is an easy-to-use guide that escorts recent college grads through major financial commitments, such as moving into an apartment or house and buying a new car. It also provides sound financial tips beyond these initial acquisitions and discusses budgeting, negotiating, paying student loans, and investing. It even gives financial advice on budgeting for a wedding.

First published in 2000, with a second edition published in 2001, Life After Graduation has been sold to more than 125 colleges and universities across the country. La Salle's Alumni Association recently presented the guide as a gift to each member of the graduating class of 2003 as a way of welcoming the new alumni.

Based on the success of their first publication, Ricchini and Arndt have since published two other survival guides: Life During College: Valuable Advice and Tips for Success (2002) and Backpack to Briefcase: Steps to a Successful Career (2003).

The authors met as students in the University of Florida's M.B.A. Entrepreneurship Program. As a result of a business plan they wrote for class, they started Life After Graduation, L.L.C., in 1999 and shortly thereafter produced their first book. The company, headquartered in Alexandria, Va., is recognized as a leader in the secondary education reference material industry.

John Ricchini, '93, is currently employed as Manager of Financial Planning and Analysis for the University of South Florida Physicians Group. He is currently pursuing a Chartered Financial Consultant designation from the American College.

Palestra Pandemonium:
A History of the Big Five
by Robert S. Lyons, '61

Temple University Press, 2002
224 pp., $27.50

The most unique city series rivalry in the history of college basketball was the Big 5 when all of the Big 5 schools hosted doubleheaders in the most hallowed halls of college play: the Palestra. Now, for the first time, a complete story of this Philadelphia tradition is revealed.

Bob Lyons describes the history of the Big 5 from its very beginning in 1955. At that time, some of the Big 5 schools—La Salle University, University of Pennsylvania, St. Joseph's University, Temple University, and Villanova University—weren't even talking to each other, and some people predicted that the colorful city series matchups would end before they began. Conducting interviews with coaches, players, and administrators—including famed Temple coach Harry Litwack's last extensive interviews before his death—Lyons offers the play-by-play on how the Big 5 became a cherished institution, and how it was ultimately undone by college basketball's own success.

Lavishly illustrated with photographs of players, teams, coaches, and the Palestra itself, Palestra Pandemonium is an immediate classic, offering a chronicle of the most envied, hotly contested college basketball rivalry. Anywhere. (taken from the book's inside flap)

Bob Lyons, '61, has covered professional and college sports for the Associated Press and has contributed articles to numerous national publications. The former director of the La Salle University News Bureau, editor of the La Salle Magazine, and instructor in the University's Communication Department, he is now president of RSL Communications. He lives in Philadelphia.

"Book Notes" will be featured periodically in upcoming issues of La Salle Magazine and the Alumni Newsletter. We invite readers to let us know if there's a book written by an alum within the last year that should be highlighted. See contact information on the Table of Contents page.

Ames, '56, Remembered On National TV

Robert Ames, '56, will always be a legend to fans of Explorers basketball, but he's also an American hero who made the ultimate sacrifice.

A member of La Salle's 1954 NCAA Championship basketball team, Ames became the CIA's top Middle East analyst and died in the 1983 bombing of the U.S. Embassy in Beirut.

On April 5, during the Men's NCAA basketball semifinals, CBS TV aired a special on the 20th anniversary of the Beirut bombing, and paid tribute to Ames during the special.

"...CBS deserves credit for its moving piece on Bob Ames," Sports Illustrated columnist Pete McEntegart wrote in April. "The producers wisely decided to use Ames' widow, Yvonne, as the poignant piece's lone narrator."

Ames, who was from Roxborough High School, was the Director for Near East and South Asia of the Directorate of Operations for the CIA.

John Bresnan (B.A. '50) was honored by the government of Indonesia on Jan. 8, 2003, at a ceremony in Jakarta and decorated with the Distinguished Service Star, the highest award for a civilian for contributions to education in Indonesia and to United States/Indonesian relations. He is only the third American to receive this honor in the 50 years since the country achieved its independence. Above, Madame Megawati Sukarnoputri, President of Indonesia, bestows the Distinguished Service Star on Bresnan.

McGrail, '69, Gets the Picture

John McGrail, '69, had only one thing on his mind as he parachuted into thin air from Army aircraft: getting a good picture.

"I would take my camera with me on the jumps and as soon as my parachute was open and clear, I'd snap photos of the sky filled with green chutes," said McGrail, a former paratrooper platoon leader in the Army's 82nd Airborne Division. "The visual impact of a mass drop from a formation of aircraft was so fascinating to me."

An ROTC student throughout his four years at La Salle, McGrail was very interested in pursuing a career in the military after graduation. But when his two years of active duty were up, he decided to try his hand at professional photography instead.

"One thing I was constantly doing when I was in the service was taking pictures," he said. "Because I had an eye for image making, I thought I should give photography a try."

In 1976, McGrail graduated second in his class from the Brooks Institute of Photography in Santa Barbara, Calif., with a B.A. He and his wife Maureen immediately moved to New York City, where he worked as an assistant for a studio photographer who shot national product ads. Shortly thereafter, he broke into magazine photojournalism and shot assignments for Time, Life, Discover, Fortune, Business Week, and the Smithsonian.

One of his images, of the Brooklyn Bridge, was recently used in the Metropolitan Opera's production of "A View from the Bridge," based on the Arthur Miller play of the same title (see photograph above). It also appeared in Portland Opera and Lyric Opera productions.

Throughout his 27 years of experience, McGrail has specialized in aerial, historical, maritime/nautical, and panoramic photography. His images are in the permanent collections and wayside exhibits of several national parks, including Yellowstone, Shenandoah, and Gettysburg, on wall-sized murals at Philadelphia's Independence Seaport Museum, and in two large format books on Philadelphia.

His proudest accomplishment is the work he has done to represent the city where he grew up. "I have an extensive file of historic Philadelphia images that I get constant calls for. It is a place that I certainly treasure, and I think I've done a pretty good job of representing it to the world," said McGrail, a Bucks County resident.

Children's Hospital at Oklahoma University Medical Center in Oklahoma City, Okla. He is also a Fellow of the American College of Healthcare Executives (ACHE) and was recently presented with the ACHE's "Regent Award for the Most Innovative Program—2002."

Nolte, '70, Fights against Terrorism

After completing a doctorate in British history in 1976, Bill Nolte, '70, said college teaching jobs were scarce, so he took a test to work for The National Security Agency (NSA), thinking he'd stay there a few years.

While he never found the right teaching job, he's now Deputy Assistant Director of Central Intelligence for Analysis at the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA).

"The United States government has more than a dozen foreign intelligence agencies, and my office's task is to coordinate the analytic programs of those agencies," said Nolte, who is on loan from the NSA to the CIA.

"What we do is classified, but if you read the papers, you can get a feel for what we're doing, focusing on issues like terrorism, unstable countries, and the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," he says. "What's happening in the news is going to keep us busy for some time."

A history major at La Salle, Nolte said, "Teachers like John Rossi, '58, and John Lukacs made history entertaining as well as challenging."

He and his daughter, Christine, '96, were instrumental in starting the new La Salle alumni chapter in Washington, D.C. Nolte is Vice President for the chapter.

Bill McShain, '62, Part of In-Air World Record

Skydivers Over Sixty (SOS) set a world record over Lake Elsinore, Calif., on Sept. 14, 2002. Bill McShain (B.A. '62) was a member of that group. Twenty-eight skydivers age 60 and older jumped from two Twin Otter airplanes at 14,000 feet and flew together in the formation above, beating the previous record of 26. To set a U.S. Parachute Association record, all participants must take exact pre-planned positions and grips, and hold the formation for at least three seconds. Bill jumped a handful of times in his early 20s, but he re-entered the sport in 1989, and has now logged over 1,600 jumps. After a 33-year career in labor relations, mostly with General Electric, Bill retired and has embarked on a second career as an assistant professor of business at Cumberland University in Lebanon, Tenn.

Invitations to follow in January 2004*

For more information, please contact Felicia Gordon Riehman: gordon@lasalle.edu or 215.951.1880.

The Charter Dinner celebrates the founding of La Salle College on March 20, 1863 and pays tribute to the generations of Christian Brothers, laypersons, and clergy whose dedication has made La Salle University the prominent institution that it is today.

Since its founding, La Salle has played a leadership role in Philadelphia as an educational institution and as a responsible corporate citizen. It is, therefore, quite fitting that the University recognize those individuals who have displayed outstanding leadership in the corporate, civic, governmental, or religious communities that shape the quality of life in this region. By joining the Charter Dinner with the presentation of the 12th La Salle University Leadership Award, we have an opportunity to celebrate La Salle's history and to honor one of those individuals whose contributions have made a critical difference to our community.

Letter from the President

Though this report can highlight only a few of the many successes made possible by your investments in La Salle, please be assured that all of us on campus see and appreciate the very positive impact of your loyal support every day.

Dear Friends of La Salle:

On behalf of the University, and especially our students, I want to offer my heartfelt thanks to our benefactors. The generosity of the thousands of La Salle's supporters, recognized in this report, certainly unites all of you with our critical mission of preparing students for personal growth, professional advancement, and service to society.

As we celebrate La Salle's 140th anniversary year, the University community feels a special sense of gratitude for your ongoing support and trust. We are especially thankful that, despite a tough economy, unrestricted contributions to the Annual Fund were strong and surpassed the prior year's mark.

Though this report can highlight only a few of the many successes made possible by your investments in La Salle, please be assured that all of us on campus see and appreciate the very positive impact of your loyal support every day.

With your help, La Salle continues to commit significant resources to develop innovative academic programs that prepare students for the challenges of contemporary society. At Commencement in May, I had the great pleasure of awarding bachelor's degrees to the first graduates of one such program, Integrated Science, Business, and Technology (ISBT). Along with Digital Arts and Speech-Language-Hearing Science, ISBT is a good example of recent program development success at La Salle, all attracting solid enrollment from students with strong credentials. During the year, we also expanded opportunities for international study, with programs in Galway and Rome for our undergraduates. These innovations build on the already strong foundation of academic excellence at La Salle—just one example of which is our well-respected Communication Department, which celebrates its 25th anniversary this year.

At the same time, we continue the Lasallian commitment to excellent teaching and true concern for students, both in and out of the classroom. This is in keeping with the over 300-year-old tradition of the Christian Brothers, to which the University remains proudly faithful. Our commitment to students is reflected in La Salle's stellar freshman-to-sophomore retention rate of 87 percent, well above the 72 percent national average.

The reputation of our academic programs and the values handed down to us by St. John Baptist de La Salle are clearly reflected in our strong application and enrollment trends. For the fifth straight year, freshman applications have set a record, exceeding 4,500. Our average SAT score is up by 19 points, and is the highest in La Salle's history. Full-time enrollment has reached 5,937, the highest since 1991.

As we strive to extend these accomplishments, La Salle will benefit from a new, five-year Strategic Plan, developed by the University community and endorsed this past spring by the Board of Trustees.

So, as we celebrate La Salle's 140th anniversary, we have much for which to be thankful, including great prospects for the future. But La Salle cannot realize its full potential as a resource for our students and society without increased involvement and support from loyal friends, especially our alumni.

I look forward to working with you and many new supporters to help the University fulfill its mission.

Many thanks, again, for your generosity to La Salle.

Sincerely,

Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., '70
President, La Salle University

Honor Roll 2002 – 2003

Gifts and grants reported in this section of the President's Report reflect donations received by the University with postmark dates between June 1, 2002, and May 31, 2003. (If your gift was postmarked in June 2003, please be assured that your gift will be listed in the 2004 President's Report.)

Contributions are reported in accordance with CASE (Council for Advancement and Support of Education) standards. Income during Fiscal Year '03 may include any of the following: gifts of cash; gifts of stock; matching gifts; grants; bequests; planned gifts; gifts-in-kind; real estate; and gifts of paid-up life insurance. We also report government grants for which the University has applied and been funded.

Every effort has been made to ensure the accuracy of the donor list. If a name has been misspelled or omitted, or if a gift has been reported incorrectly, we appreciate your assistance in reporting it to the Office for University Advancement at 215.951.1540.

IN MEMORY OF TWO OF LA

Benjamin D. Bernstein

June 24, 1907 – May 1, 2003

Benjamin D. Bernstein, a philanthropic art collector and founder of a prosperous moving and storage company in Philadelphia, died at the age of 95 on May 1. A La Salle University honorary degree recipient in 1984, Bernstein came from humble beginnings. He dropped out of school in the eighth grade to help support his family.

In 1929, Bernstein married Evelyn Glauser. Shortly after, she helped Bernstein set up a business of his own which became Quaker Moving & Storage Co. As his business was growing, Bernstein traveled extensively and developed a love of art and collecting. He began supporting young artists by purchasing their work. He surrounded himself with modern and contemporary paintings, drawings, prints, and sculptures. As his collection grew, Bernstein gave hundreds of works of art to colleges, institutions, and museums.

"Ben donated upwards of 100 paintings, prints, and sculptures to our Art Museum," said Brother Daniel Burke, F.S.C., La Salle University Art Museum founder and Director. "He would say to me, 'Come down and tell me what you want.' His house was filled with such wonderful things." In recognition of his generosity, the Art Museum's 20th Century Gallery bears Bernstein's name.

In addition to donating works of art, Bernstein set up and periodically added to an acquisition fund enabling the Art Museum to purchase other works.

"Ben set up the fund in addition to what he donated, and we would use it to buy paintings from all periods," explained Br. Daniel. "Ben meant so much to the Art Museum as a donor and passionate collector. On top of that, he was a philosopher of life, very wise and witty. He had a very generous heart."

Bernstein is survived by a daughter, Robin; brothers Edward and Stanley; and 18 nieces and nephews.

SALLE'S DEAREST FRIENDS

Joseph F. Flubacher, '35

January 4, 1914 June 23, 2003

Joseph F. Flubacher, a legendary economics teacher at La Salle University for 50 years, died June 23 of congestive heart failure at Cooper Medical Center in Camden, N.J., at the age of 89.

A 1935 graduate of La Salle with a degree in economics, Flubacher worked at La Salle as the president's secretary while earning a master's degree at Temple University. He joined La Salle's economics faculty in 1938, and later earned an Ed.D. in economics from Temple. He retired from teaching in May of 1988, and was awarded Professor Emeritus status. For many years afterward, he visited the campus weekly, and was involved with Sigma Phi Lambda fraternity.

"Joseph Flubacher was a true 'icon' of La Salle University," said Brother Michael J. McGinniss, F.S.C., '70, President of the University. "He personified the discipline of economics for thousands of La Salle alumni over a lengthy, successful career as a teacher and department chairperson. He championed the Catholic and Lasallian concern for human dignity and social justice by paying particular attention to the tradition of papal social teaching initiated by Pope Leo XIII in 1891, and continued in our time by Pope John Paul II. He modeled those great principles in everyday life in all his dealings with his students and his colleagues in the faculty, staff, and administration."

"To his very last days, he maintained an active interest in his beloved La Salle and its students, particularly those in the Sigma Phi Lambda Fraternity, of which he was a member. The Christian Brothers honored Joe's lifetime of commitment to La Salle by making him an affiliated member of their religious order. Joe Flubacher gave his life to La Salle University and we are forever indebted to him. For myself, I am very proud to have known him as my teacher of freshman economics, my faculty colleague, my friend, and fellow Lasallian," said Br. Michael.

In 1998, he received the Signum Fidei medal from La Salle's Alumni Association. The award, which takes its name from the motto of the Christian Brothers, Sign of Faith, is given annually to a person who has made a contribution to society. In 2000, Flubacher received an honorary doctorate from the University.

In 1996, The University started a scholarship in his name, given annually to a senior economics major. Flubacher also received the Lindback Distinguished Teaching Award at La Salle.

A bachelor, Flubacher is survived by a niece, Rosemary A. Gallagher, a nephew, James E. Gallagher—both of whom graduated from La Salle—and Gallagher's wife, Christine.

Living a Dream

Iya La Bunka, '80, always knew she wanted to work in television or film.

Today, as the Vice President of Productions for Walt Disney Studios, La Bunka is living her dream.

In truth, she has been living her dream ever since she moved out to the Golden State in 1979—and it all started here at La Salle University.

"Through La Salle, I got an internship at Channel 10 (an NBC News affiliate), and it was a phenomenal opportunity for me. It was fascinating, and I absorbed everything," said La Bunka, whose father, Mikoslav La Bunka, was a history professor at La Salle for 25 years.

When she arrived in California, La Bunka started out on the sets of independent films working with Roger Corman, a pioneer in the independent film industry.

By 1997, however, La Bunka was ready to make the move to a studio. She began working for Disney as an executive production manager.

Six years and a couple of promotions later, La Bunka is the Vice President of Productions at Disney and loving it.

Since then, She has worked on several major blockbusters such as all three M. Night Shyamalan movies (The Sixth Sense, Unbreakable, and Signs) and Spike Lee's Summer of Sam and 25th Hour.

"Once a film gets a green light, it is my job to make sure everything runs smoothly. I act as the interface between the filmmakers and the studio. It is a balancing act and a challenge which takes a great deal of diplomacy, but in the end when the finished product is delivered, we hopefully have a great film," La Bunka said.

"I am in a great place right now," she said. "I work in a positive and inspiring atmosphere with the best there is in the business and that is enormously satisfying."

Iya La Bunka, '80, and daughter, Nina Tarnawsky.

Center in Oklahoma City, Okla. He is also a Fellow of the America College of Healthcare Executives (ACHE) and was recently presented the ACHE's "Regent Award for the Most Innovative Program—2002."

Diane C. Wilmski (B.A.) has rejoined the Federal Reserve System, this time in Atlanta's Sixth Federal Reserve System. She relocated to Atlanta during 2002 as an Operations Risk Specialist.

1978 Vincent D. Moffa (B.A.) has been named Staff Vice President of Corporate Insurance Worldwide for the Hertz Corporation. He reports to the C.F.O. of Hertz Corporation.

Edna Volz (B.A.) of Plymouth Meeting, Pa., is currently a Quality and Productivity Manager at Siemens Health Services in Malvern, Pa. She recently presented a paper at the ninth annual Deming Research Seminar at Fordham University in New York City.

1979 Peter L. DeAngelis Jr. (B.S., M.B.A., '85) left his position as Chief Financial Officer of the University of Pennsylvania Health System (UPHS) in June to become Executive Vice President and C.F.O. for Catholic Health East, a 14,000-bed, faith-based health system that includes, among other facilities, 31 acute-care hospitals and 46 skilled nursing facilities in 11 eastern states from Maine to Florida. He joined Penn in the summer of 1997; and only two years later, was promoted to C.F.O. During his four-year tenure as C.F.O., he was one of the driving forces behind the Health System's remarkable financial recovery and stabilization. He took the lead in designing UPHS's successful "Code Green" initiative—an ongoing effort designed to rapidly and efficiently secure payments for services provided.

Kevin P. Hanaway (B.A.) of Sewell, N.J., has been awarded Diplomat status by The American College of Healthcare Executives (ACHE) at the National Healthcare Congress held annually in March in Chicago, Ill. Also, Hanaway received national certification in critical care nursing, earning the credential "CCRN."

A Generous Gift

The photograph shown to the right (of Philadelphia's Kimmel Center for Performing Arts) was taken by La Salle alumnus John McGrail, '69, and used as the cover of a large format book on the city of Philadelphia. The book, written by Kurt R. Niland and produced in cooperation with the Greater Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce, was published in 2002 by Community Communications, Inc. McGrail is the feature photographer in this book and a similar one produced by CCI in 1997, titled, Philadelphia: World Class!

In the book's chapter on education, McGrail's photos of La Salle's campus are featured in a two-page spread on the University. McGrail generously donated these photos and others to his alma mater as a gift-in-kind. Several are featured on the pages of this issue.

A professional photographer for nearly 30 years, McGrail's work has appeared in such magazines as Life, Time, Fortune, Business Week, Discover, Smithsonian, and People, and has been published in more than 80 countries. He specializes in aerial, historical, maritime/nautical, and panoramic photography.

A native Philadelphian, McGrail said his proudest accomplishment is the work he has done to represent the city where he grew up. "I have an extensive file of historic Philadelphia images that I get constant calls for. It is a place that I certainly treasure, and I think I've done a pretty good job of representing it to the world," he said.

McGrail and his family currently reside in Bucks County. He can be contacted through his Web site at www.johnmcgrail.com.

Annual Alumni Association Awards Bestowed on November 14

Anthony Cardinal Bevilacqua, Archbishop Emeritus of Philadelphia, is this year's Signum Fidei Medal recipient. The medal derives its name from the motto of the Christian Brothers, Sign of Faith. The Alumni Association presents the award each year to an individual who has made noteworthy contributions to the advancement of humanitarian principles in keeping with the Christian/Judeo traditions.

Since coming to Philadelphia in 1987, Cardinal Bevilacqua has made spiritual renewal of the faithful a priority and has undertaken an active pastoral ministry. He regularly visits parishes and schools throughout the archdiocese as well as people of all faiths through his visits to state hospitals, prisons, Christian churches, and synagogues. Cardinal Bevilacqua was the first and only Cardinal in the world to host a live weekly radio call-in program, entitled Live with Cardinal Bevilacqua, which aired on WZZD-AM in Philadelphia from 1995 to 2000. Cardinal Bevilacqua continues to make regular appearances on national and local television and radio programs.

Elmer F. (Bud) Hansen Jr., '58, will receive the John J. Finley Award, given annually in recognition of those who have provided outstanding service to the University and the Alumni Association. The award is named in honor of John J. Finley, '24, affectionately known as "Mr. La Salle."

Hansen is President/C.E.O. of Hansen Properties, Inc., a company that engages in real estate development for commercial, residential, and golf course communities. He is a member of La Salle's Board of Trustees, Explorer Club, and Advancement Committee. He also is the owner and operator of the Blue Bell Country Club and sponsors the annual President's Cup Golf Tournament.
